

RHETORIC
IN TWO BOOKS
OF WHICH
The First TEACHES of Tropes and Figures,
The Second of Voice and Gesture:
FOR THE USE OF SCHOOLS,
NOW IN A MORE ACCURATE FIFTH EDITION.¹

Note from the translator

The copy used for the translation was that in the Folger Shakespeare Library, digitised on EEBO (Early English Books Online). Occasional illegible or missing passages in this copy (e.g. marginal notes cut off) are supplied from other editions (as noted).

For the technical terms of rhetoric, I have made use of a mid 17th-century handbook which covers the same ground, with some reference to Butler: John Smith, The Myserie of Rhetorique unvail'd, wherein above 130 of the Tropes and Figures are severally derived from the Greek into English together with lively Definitions and variety of Latin, English Scriptural examples ... Conducing very much to the right understanding of the sense of the letter of the Scripture, etc. (London, 1665).

Where the marginalia are simply headings replicating words in the main text for ease of reference, I have ignored them. In the section on figures, the marginal headings give the Latin equivalent for the Greek name in the text and I have noted these.

Numerals in the text in the form (1.) represent Butler's own note cues, referenced at the end of each chapter. The footnotes are my own, except those signed JR (i.e. Jennifer Richards).

In the second section, from chapter 12 on, Butler's notes are given by asterisks. I have provided translations of all the quotations; and given the original Latin where the discussion requires it, preserving Butler's spelling (except for u/v and i/j) but not the ligatures and diacritics. I have also noted where the text of a quotation differs significantly from modern editions, but except occasionally it has not been felt necessary to specify the latter. I have given author and title of works in full at first appearance (whether in my footnote or main text) and shortened them thereafter, though I have mostly followed Butler's usage in his main text.

¹ The 5th edition is badly printed and proofread, and it contains a number of errors; it is also not well laid out in terms of text hierarchy in many places. These problems are addressed in the 1629 edition, and it may be significant that the latter specifies it was printed 'at the author's expense'.

BOOK I

On Style (Elocutio)*²

Chapter 1

Rhetoric is the art of speaking well:

² 'Garnishing of speech, called Elocution' – Smith, Mysterie, B1r.

Whose power, judiciously employed, has wonderful effects. And for this reason, Plato, grown angry at the sophists and rhetors of Greece, calls this the ὀψοποιικὴν, κομμωτικὴν, κολακ[ευτ]ικὴν, γοητικὴν (opsopoikēn, kommōtikēn, kolakeutikēn, goētikēn) art,³ that is the art of cooking, embellishment, flattery and witchcraft. And indeed, there is no spicing, no makeup, no flattery nor any witchcraft, by which uneducated and inexperienced listeners are more easily captivated than by rhetorical ornaments fitted to an appropriate thought.

There are two parts of rhetoric: style (elocutio) and delivery (pronunciatio).⁴ Style is the adornment of speech:

And that is exceedingly powerful in its own right: as in the case of Curio,⁵ who, although he was devoid to the greatest extent of the other admired qualities of eloquence, was nevertheless on account of the splendour of his style, both in its abundance, and in a certain uninhibited goodness (bonitas) and fluent quickness, accounted as an orator to be next to the best.

Style is the use of a trope or figure. A trope is style [A1v] in which a word or phrase (vox) (1.) changes from its natural meaning to another.

And to be sure, necessity was the mother of the trope,⁶ but afterwards enjoyment gave it honour. For as clothing was first invented for the sake of keeping out the cold, afterwards it began to be also used for adorning and honouring the body; so did wordplay begin as a result of the poverty of language, but became popular as a result of the delight it gave.

There are four dispositions (2.) common to this. For if a trope is rather harsh or uneven, it is called CATACHRESIS (3.); if rather elevated and bold, HYPERBOLE (4.); if it contains many turns, METALEPSIS (5.); if it is extended through many, ALLEGORY (6.).

Hyperbole is either auxesis or meiosis. It is auxesis when, in order to amplify or exaggerate something, we substitute a word with a stronger one in its place: as when we say ‘magnificent’ for ‘generous’; ‘savage’ for ‘rough’; ‘sacrilegious’ for ‘wicked’. Meiosis or ³ For the first three see Plato, Gorgias 462–4; I cannot find the specific source in Plato for γοητικὴν.

⁴ Wilbur Samuel Howell, Logic and Rhetoric in England 1500–1700, NY, 1961, p. 264, translates these ‘style and delivery’.

⁵ Gaius Scribonius Curio (c. 124 – 53 BC). Cicero, Brutus, 60.216.

⁶ i.e. in order to describe things for which no words yet existed (described later as the ‘poverty of language’) [JR].

tapinosis is when, to understate or depreciate something, we use a weaker word than the subject demands: as when we call a sycophant ‘sweet-talking and pleasant’ or a spendthrift ‘daring’, or a noble man ‘brave’.

A hyperbole that increases (7.) a defect is m[e]iosis: as when we call a small man a ‘pygmy’, or a dull-witted one ‘thick as a post’, or one who does not answer ‘dumb’. But we have special praise for allegory, which is the one that captivates our ears wonderfully. For as of all the tropes it is the one that is ornate that is great, so this is by far the greatest of those that are extended and connected.

In an allegory (8.) you must hold onto something: so that you finish with the same kind (genus) of thing with which you began; otherwise, the lack of logical connection will be quite awful.

¶ [1.] Word or phrase [vox]⁷: both complex (a phrase) and simple (a word). Single words in fact allow for tropes more frequently, but phrases do too, on occasion: as in metonymy, ‘your college in the suburbs’⁸ or ‘the flourishing age’⁹; in irony: ‘I pass over mentioning’ or ‘I make no use of’; in metaphor: ‘you sow’¹⁰ or ‘to give thanks’; in synecdoche: ‘the icy Ocean’¹¹ or ‘the whole judgement seat’¹². Phrases of this sort are rather common in proverbs or sayings: as in [A2r] ‘to wash a brick’ i.e. to labour in vain, as he does who washes a brick; ‘you kick against the pricks’,¹³ i.e. by resisting you hurt yourself not your opponent, as he does who kicks against a pointed goad; ‘I hold the wolf by the ears’,¹⁴ i.e. I don’t know whether I should carry on with what I’ve started, or whether I should give it up, as when one is holding a wolf by the ears; ‘the wolves saw him first’,¹⁵ i.e. he was struck dumb, as one whom the wolves have seen before he saw them; ‘A Delphic sword’, i.e. a thing suitable for various uses, as was the sword of Delphi, which was crafted in such a way that at the same

⁷ Vox can mean word or phrase.

⁸ Cicero, De Oratore I.21.98.

⁹ i.e. youth; see below, chapter 5, note 8. Cicero, Cato Maior De Senectute 6.20 (though similar phrases are common in Latin).

¹⁰ Cicero, De Oratore II.65.261, quoting the proverb ‘as you sow, so shall you reap’.

¹¹ Juvenal, Satire II.1–2 (the name Ocean standing for the sea).

¹² Cicero, Philippics II.25.63 quoted by Quintilian, Institutio Oratoria IX.4.44. The passage, no doubt pleasingly juicy to Butler’s young readers, referring to a hungover Mark Antony throwing up in public, is quoted below in chapter 10.

¹³ Cf. Acts 9.5 and Terence, Phormio 78, quoting a common saying.

time it would slaughter sacrificial victims and bring punishment to the guilty;¹⁶ ‘spoken from the Tripod’, i.e. the truth, as something spoken from the Tripod at Delphi was thought to be, etc. Each of these examples constitutes a single trope, but, as you see, made up not of single words but phrases, although elsewhere Talon,¹⁷ when he declares what is true to be ‘for the most part, simple’, seems to feel otherwise.

2. Affections. The affection of a trope, by their genus, is: of one that is uneven, catachresis; of one that is rather bold, hyperbole; of several in one word or phrase: metalepsis; of several in several words or phrases: allegory.

3. Catachresis. Catachresis is a rather harsh and unpleasing substitution of a word or phrase as for example when some name is put in for another in whose place it seems not to have been introduced but to have broken in, and to have come there not by request but by force.

4. Hyperbole. Hyperbole is an untruthful exaggeration, or a rather daring extravagance of speech, which, though it may be beyond belief, should nonetheless not be beyond moderation: it is enough to warn that hyperbole tells a lie, but not to the extent that it means to deceive through falsehood. These words are Quintilian’s [Institutio Oratoria] VIII.6 [74]

5. Metalepsis. Metalepsis is the multiplying of a trope in one word or phrase, namely (nempe)¹⁸ when something unsuitable is signified first by an unsuitable word, then from that unsuitable word perhaps something else unsuitable is signified, and so on until one is led to the correct meaning, with (as Fabius [Quintilian] says) an intervening step providing the transition, or (as [Cornelius] Valerius¹⁹ understands it) when it goes step-by-step to what is meant.

6. Allegory. Allegory is a continuation of a trope, where indeed a number of tropes of the same genus are joined together.

7. Increases: since to exaggerate a defect is to depreciate the thing that has it. See chapter 9, note 14.

¹⁸ Nempe is used elsewhere by Butler to mean ‘namely’, the normal meaning is ‘of course’. Quintilian VIII.6 dismisses metalepsis summarily while also explaining it rather more clearly.

Chapter 2

The kinds (1.) of trope are metonymy and irony, metaphor and synecdoche.

METONYMY is a trope of cause (2.) in place of effect, or of subject in place of adjunct; or the other way round (3.). A metonymy of the cause is one either of the efficient or of the matter.²¹

Of the EFFICIENT, as when the author and originator are used instead of the things they created, [Cicero,] Pro Marcello [6.17]: Those citizens whom we lost, the force of Mars (4.) destroyed, not the wrath of victory'; [Virgil,] Georgics I.[295]:

Or with Vulcan (5.) boils down the liquid of sweet must.

So Oceanus (6.) and Tethys, Nereus and Doris, Neptune and Amphitrite, and even Pontus are used metaleptically²² [i.e. substituted] for the sea: Liber (7.) and Ceres for wine and bread²³ make a catachresis in prose. In Lucan's [Pharsalia], Book IV, catachresis is rather common [52–3]:

Snows burned (8.) the mountain-country, and hoar-frosts – short-lived at the sight of the sun – the low-lying fields.

There is a metalepsis at [Cicero,] Pro Roscio Amerino [5.13]: 'They are the accusers, who took possession of this man's Fortunes'²⁴ (9.)' and [Virgil,] Aeneid IV [547]:

²¹ See the English translation of Ramus's Rhetorica by Butler's contemporary, Abraham Fraunce, The Arcadian Rhetorike: or The Praecepts of Rhetorike made Plaine by Examples Greeke, Latin, English, Italian, French, Spanish, out of Homers Ilias, and Odissea, Virgils Aeglogs, [...] and Aeneis, Sir Philip Sydnieis Arcadia, Songs and Sonets (1588): 'Metonymia is a trope which useth the name of one thing for the name of another that agreeth with it, as when the cause is turned to signifie the thing caused, the thing caused to signifie the cause, the subject to expres the adjunct, or the adjunct the subject' (A3r); 'The Metonymia of the cause is double, of the efficient, or materiall cause: of the efficient, as when the Autor & inventor is put for the things by him invented & found' (ibid.) [JR].

²² Butler's somewhat idiosyncratic habit is to add a Greek adverbial ending (in Greek characters) to a Latin word (in Roman script).

²³ These examples are given in Quintilian, VIII.6.24 as too bold for use in courtroom style.

²⁴ Cicero uses the plural fortunae to mean wealth or possessions.

Nay, die according to your deserts, and fend off sorrow with iron (10.)

An allegory, at Terence, The Eunuch [732]:

Without Ceres (11.) and Liber (12.), Venus (13.) grows cold.²⁵

In this sense it is moreover very common, or rather (since that word is insufficient) necessary, to name writers in place of their written works. Martial, Book XIV [190–91]:

Vast Livy (14.) is constrained within little parchments, for whom in his entirety my library has not space.

METONYMY OF THE MATTER is when the word for the matter is put in place of something made of it.²⁶

[Cicero,] In Verrem 6:²⁷ ‘When the dining couches were laid out and the silver (15.) set out in the house’ is a metalepsis.

[Ovid,] Metamorphoses I [677]:

[A3r]

... and sings to fashioned oats (16.)²⁸

Likewise, Aeneid VIII [91]:

the daubed fir (17.) glides through the sea.

²⁵ A proverb, also quoted by Cicero.

²⁶ See Fraunce, Arcadian Rhetorike: ‘The Metonymia of the materiall cause is, when the matter is put for the thing thereof made’ (A4r) [JR].

²⁷ II.4.33.

²⁸ ‘oats’ (avenae) was used by Latin poets synonymously with ‘reed’ (arundo, which is identified in the note as a species of the generic reed calamus); hence ‘oats’ is here used to signify the material for a shepherd’s pipe.

But ‘fir’ (18.) used for ‘planks’²⁹ in prose is a catachresis. There is an example of allegory here: Horace, Epistles, Book I.2 [47–8]:

No house or estate, nor any heap of copper and gold (19.), has ever taken the fever away from their master’s sick body.

[Cicero,] De Legibus II.[18.45]: ‘Copper [or bronze] and iron (20.) are the tokens of war, not of a temple’.

Notes to Chapter 2

¶ [1.] Genera. The word genus is very often used for an intermediate species (i.e. which has also other species subject to it, in respect of which it can be a genus) not only in Cicero and all the Roman writers, but also in Aristotle himself, as in his chapter on quality where he names the second, third and fourth genera of quality.

2. Cause. The cause is the thing by virtue of which something is: but it is fourfold: the efficient by which, or the matter out of which, the form in which or the end on account of which a thing is. But of these four, only the first two have a place here.

3. The other way round: i.e. of effect in place of cause, or adjunct in place of subject.

4. Mars: battle. For Mars was held by the ancients to be the first originator of arms and wars: Diodorus Siculus, Book VI.³⁰ So Martial on Caesar’s amphitheatre, epigram [De Spectaculis] 24.[3]:

So that this naval Enyo with ships may not deceive you i.e. a naval battle or naumachia: for Bellona, the sister of Mars, was also held to be the goddess of war and battles.

5. Vulcan: fire. Vulcan is said by Diodorus to be the originator of fire in this manner: when he saw a wood burning from a fallen thunderbolt, he added wood to it more plentifully; and in particular showed mortals the use of fire in working metals,³¹ and so he is used here in place of ‘fire’, as also below (see note 6).

²⁹ Or writing tablets (tabellae). See my comment at note 39.

³¹ Ibid., I.13.3 and V.74.2.

6. Ocean. Ocean was the son of Caelus and Vesta, the most ancient god of the sea, who had for wife his sister Tethys. Nereus the son of Ocean and his wife Tethys took for himself his sister Doris: to Neptune the son of Saturn and Ops, to whom in the division of the earth fell the kingship of the sea, was wed Amphitrite the daughter of Nereus and Doris; Pontus was the son of Nereus and brother of Amphitrite; as a result these gods and goddesses are used in place of 'sea',

Ocean in Aeneid I [287]:

[A3v]

Who sets the bounds of his empire at Ocean and of his fame among the stars;

Tethys in Lucan, Book VI [67–8]:

Or when unsettled Tethys and the Kentish coast are raging, the Britons of Caledonia know nothing of the stormy waves;

Nereus in Metamorphoses I [187–8]

Now, wherever Nereus surrounds the whole world with sound, I must destroy the race of mortals ...;

Doris in [Virgil,] Eclogues X [5]

Let Doris not mix in her brackish water;

Neptune in Horace, Epistles, Book I.11 [10]

To watch from land Neptune foaming in the distance;

Amphitrite in Metamorphoses, Book I [13–14]

... nor had Amphitrite extended her arms along the world's far-reaching shores.

But Pontus is not put for the whole sea except by metalepsis: for first he was used figuratively to signify that sea which runs from the swamp of Maeotis³² as far as the island of Tenedos in the Aegean Sea,³³ as in Lucan, Book V [234]

Where Pontus, constricted, seethes in a rush of water and Georgics I [207]

[By whom] are attempted Pontus and the narrows of oyster-rich Abydos

(from which the neighbouring region also received its name, as in citation below, note 8). Then by synecdoche of a part it gets used for the whole sea, as in [Ovid,] Ibis [111–12]:

Let neither Vulcan nor the air offer themselves to you, nor land nor sea show you your way.

7. Liber. We have commonly heard ‘Vulcan’ for fire; and ‘Mars was fought with varied success’ is accomplished style; and it is more decent to say ‘Venus’ than intercourse; but to say ‘Liber’ and ‘Ceres’ for wine and bread is to take a greater liberty than the severe style of the law court may bear, says Quintilian in Book VIII, chapter 6 [24].³⁴

8. Burned. The snows and frosts are said here, catachrestically, to burn, for to dry up and consume, which are the effects of burning. For snows and frosts dry out the natural moisture of things by their excessive cold, just as the sun and fire do by too great heat: and so they consume and damage those things. So in Ovid, Tristia III, elegy 2 [7–8]:

But after suffering many dangers on land and sea, Pontus, burnt with unending cold, keeps hold of me.

9. Fortunes: wealth. A metalepsis: for this trope is double. ‘Fortunes’ for Fortune is a synecdoche of number, and ‘Fortune’ for the blessings and gifts of Fortune is a metonymy of the cause, of the efficient.

³² The Sea of Azov.

³³ That is, the entrance of the Hellespont (the Dardanelles or Strait of Gallipoli) opposite which the island of Tenedos stands.

³⁴ Quoted verbatim.

10. Iron: death. A metalepsis: for ‘iron’ for a sword or some weapon of iron is a metonymy of the matter, and ‘a sword’ for death, of which it is the instrumental cause, is [A4r] a metonymy of the efficient.

11. Ceres. Without bread and wine, love grows cold. An allegory: for the metonymy is extended. Ceres is said to have been the first to teach mankind the use of grain, to mill it and make bread, since before that they had fed on acorns. Diodorus VI; Pliny [Natural History] VII.³⁵

12. Liber. Diodorus, Book IV³⁶ says that Bacchus was the first to pass on the method of pressing wine from the grape, but persuaded by more ancient learning we attribute this to Noah.

13. Venus. Diodorus, Book VI, chapter 15, writes that Jupiter gave to Venus the care of maidens of mature age and the other things that are celebrated concerning the rites and bonds of matrimony,³⁷ as a result of which the poets make her the goddess not only of love but also of beauty, grace and delight, and for this reason she is sometimes also put for these. Catullus, in his poem on Quintia and Lesbia [86.5]:

Lesbia is beautiful, since she is wholly fair, and has stolen all the Venuses from the other women for herself alone.

that is, grace, charm and delight.

14. Livy. The story of Roman history was written by Livy in 140 books.

15. Silver: furnishings made of silver.

16. Oats: a pipe made of reeds (arundo). A metalepsis: ‘oats’ for the oat stem is a synecdoche of the whole, the stem of oats for a stem in general is a synecdoche of the species; a reed (calamus) for arundo is the contrary synecdoche, of the genus for the species (for the pipe with which Mercury sang in this quotation was of arundo into which the nymph Syrinx was transformed); finally the arundo for the pipe itself is a metonymy of the matter for the effect.

³⁷ Ibid., V.73.1.

17.³⁸ Fir. A metalepsis. ‘Fir’ (abies) for planks (tabellae)³⁹ of firwood is a metonymy of the matter, and ‘planks’ for a ship is the same, metonymy of the matter.

18. Fir. A catachresis: for so Quintilian, Book VIII, chapter 6 [20]: ‘In prose it is not acceptable to use “a stern” (puppis) for a ship, nor “fir” for planks (tabellae)’.

19. Copper and gold: coins of bronze and gold. An allegory.

20. Copper and iron: arms made of copper and iron alloyed (bronze); an allegory, for here two metonymies are joined together, copper and iron, as above, copper and gold.

³⁸ The text is corrupt due to a misprint (‘tsabellæ’ for ‘tabellæ’) and dittography. The correct text (ending at ‘eadem est Metonymia’, without the following ‘est ... Metonym[i]a’) is given in 1597 and 1629.

³⁹ ‘planks’ seems to be what Butler means, though the usual classical meaning is ‘writing tablets’; Butler’s seems to be a mediaeval usage. It is not immediately clear from Quintilian VIII.6.20 – which Butler is following here – what Quintilian has in mind but there is no reason to suppose it is not writing tablets.

Chapter 3

METONYMY OF THE EFFECT is when the efficient is signified by the effects.⁴⁰ Tristia, Book I, elegy 1 [43–4]:

All fear is of no use to⁴¹ songs (1.): at this very moment I imagine a sword cleaving to my throat; and in the same elegy [68]:

[A4v]

That work (2.) has paid the penalty it deserved to;

Aeneid VI [843]:

The Scipios, Libya's destruction (3.) ...;

Terence, The Eunuch [941–2]

By heavens I will pay you back for those words and deeds, you act of wickedness! (4.)

This metonymy occurs also in epithets. Pro Marcello [3.9]: 'Victory is by its nature insolent (5.) and arrogant', and in the same oration [6.16]: 'to dread the savagery (6.) of victory', where there is a metalepsis, as also in Aeneid I [60]:

But the almighty father hid them in black (7.) caves.

Here there is an example of an allegory: Aeneid VI [275]:

Pale (8.) sicknesses dwell there, and sad old ages.

⁴¹ Modern editions read 'obest' (is harmful to) for 'abest' (is absent from, of no use to, etc.).

So the orator (9.) speaks of ‘hasty wrath’, ‘cheerful youth’, ‘indolent leisure’. But indeed in this sense there are very many epithets used by both poets and orators.

Notes to Chapter 3

¶ [1.] Songs: poets who compose songs.

2. Work: Ovid, as author of that work.

3. Destruction: the effectors of the destruction, who brought destruction upon Libya.

4. Act of wickedness (scelus): wicked contriver of wicked deeds. An auxesis: for he thus reprimands the man more seriously and harshly than if he had called him ‘wicked’. A similar hyperbole is in a metonymy of the adjunct. Ulysses uses this metonymy too in the oration over the arms of Achilles, Metamorphoses XIII [128]:

If my wishes, like yours, Pelasgian Greeks, had any value, there would be no question who the inheritor should be of such a great contest i.e. of the arms, about which the contest was fought.

5. Insolent: i.e. making men insolent and arrogant; for so it renders the victors.

6. Savagery. A metalepsis, ‘the savagery of victory’ for a savage victory, is the fourth mode (modus quartus);⁴² and ‘a savage victory’, which makes the victor savage, is the second mode.⁴³

7. Black: deep. A metalepsis. ‘Black’ (ater) for dark (tenebrosus) is a common metaphor; ‘dark’ for deep (profundus) is a metonymy of the effect. For in caves depth is the cause of darkness.

8. Pale. Sickesses are called pale, and old ages sad, because the former make men pale, and the latter make men sad; where the extension of metonymy in ‘pale’ and ‘sad’ makes an allegory.

9. So the orator: in the words of Quintilian, Book VIII, chapter 6 [27].

⁴² Metonymy of the adjunct. The ‘fourth mode’ refers to the different types of metonymy which Butler is working through in order. He is using a classification into 4 types of metonymy but since in this classification Metonymia Efficientis and Materiae are counted as one, that is not immediately obvious in his text.

Smith lists them thus:

- 1. When the cause is put for the effect.
- 2. When the effect is put for the cause.
- 3. When the subject is put for the adjunct.
- 4. When the adjunct is put for the subject.

And then, quoting Thomas Farnaby (Index Rhetoricus, 1625):

1. Efficientis, ut Inventoris; Marte. Lyaeo. Auctoris: Legitur Juvenalis. Livius ingens. Materiae: Pinus, ferrum, aeris acervus, arundo. Aut instrumenti: Gladius, lingua, arma manus{que}

2. Effecti: Clades Libyae. Mors frigida pallet.

3. Subjecti: ^a Curii. ^b Paterae. ^c Germania. ^d Rostra. ^e Vcalegon. ^f Cor, os. ^g Patronus. ^h Nox. ⁱ A/maryllis.

4. Adjuncti: ^k Fasces. ^l Scelus. ^m aetas nul/la. ⁿ Libelli. (Mysterie, B6r-v).

⁴³ Metonymy of the effect.

[A5r]

Chapter 4

METONYMY OF THE SUBJECT is when the name proper to a subject is used to signify the adjunct.⁴⁴ [Ovid,] Heroides 16 [101–2]:⁴⁵

You do not see more, but you rashly dare more: there's no more heart (1.) in you, but less face⁴⁶ (2.);

[Horace,] Epode 12 [5] is a catachresis:

If an octopus or noisome he-goat (3.) is sleeping in those hairy armpits.

In this case a container is put for the thing contained: Aeneid I [738–9]

... Readily he drank off the foaming cup (4.) and slaked his thirst from the full gold (5.);

[Horace,] Sermones II, satire 3 [82–3]

By far the greatest portion of hellebore should be given to the avaricious: I don't know if there's a case for giving the whole of Anticyra (6.) to them; and this metonymy is by far the most frequent, when a place is used instead of its inhabitants. Metamorphoses, Book I [151]:

Lest the heavens (7.) on high should be safer than the earth (8.).

⁴⁴ See Fraunce, Arcadian Rhetorike: 'The Metonymia of the subject, is when the word that properlie signifieth the subject is brought to expresse the thing adjoynded thereunto, as when the thing that containeth is put for that which is contained, the place for the thing therein placed, the possessor for the thing possessed' (A5r-v) [JR].

⁴⁶ Butler glosses 'less face' (minus oris) to mean less shame, though this is not a usual meaning of os; some modern editions of Ovid correct the reading to nimis oris: 'too much face', that is effrontery or cheek, which is a much better meaning. (The word was not used in the modern sense of 'face' i.e. dignity or prestige.)

[Cicero,] In Pisonem [7.16], ‘that you let loose the prison (9.) against me’, is a hyperbole. A metalepsis is found at Aeneid II [265]:

they attack the city (10.) when it is buried in sleep and wine, and Metamorphoses XIII [349]:

I defeated Pergama (11.) then, when I made it possible for it to be defeated.

There is an allegory at [Cicero,] *Pro Pompeio*⁴⁷ [11.30]: ‘I have as my witness Italy (12.), which the victor L. Sulla himself admitted had been set free by this man’s virtue and good counsel; I have as my witness Sicily, which, when it was encircled by many dangers on all sides, he extricated not by threat of war but by a swift plan of action; [...] I have as my witness Gaul, through which a route for our legions to Spain was open by the slaughter of the Gauls; I have as my witness Spain, which time and again saw numerous enemies overcome and thrown down by him’.

In other cases (13.), too, a place is used to refer to the things located there.

[A5v]

De Oratore I [8.32]: ‘But come, so that you aren’t always thinking about the forum (14.), the bench, the rostra, the Senate’: which is an allegory, as again, in the same speech [I.21.98]: ‘I far prefer your college in the suburbs to that Academy (15.) and Lyceum’.

Of this kind too is that sort where a thing possessed is understood from the possessor. Aeneid II [311–12]:

... Now Ucalegon (16.), next to it, is ablaze ...;

[Cicero,] Epistulae Ad Atticum V [7]: ‘When I had been three days with Pompey and *chez*⁴⁸ Pompey (17.)’ and ‘I prefer [...] to walk about with you (18.) chez toi’⁴⁹. Cicero [Cato Maior] De Senectute [16.55]: ‘whose villa I gaze on, for it is not far from me (19.)’.

⁴⁷ i.e. De Imperio Cn. Pompeii (also known as De Lege Manilia).

⁴⁸ The point is not translatable into English; the French chez (at the house of) equivalates to Latin apud.

⁴⁹ Ad Atticum IV.10.

In this way we say that a man is eaten up, whose inheritance is eaten up: Terence, Heautontimorumenos [462]:

What do you think will become of you, when (20.) they are endlessly eating you up?

In this way we say ‘sixty thousand Romans were slain at Cannae by Hannibal (21.)’.⁵⁰

In this way advocates for clients in litigation use their own personas for the personas of the clients. [Cicero,] Pro Caecina [29.82]: ‘You have said that you have reinstated (22.) me. I say that I have not been reinstated by the praetor’s decree’. In this way too is the name of the thing signified put for the sign. [Ovid,] Fasti I [201]:

The whole of Jupiter (23.) only just stood in the little temple, and in Jove’s right hand was an earthen thunderbolt;

Eclogues III [46]:

in the middle he placed Orpheus (24.) and the woods that followed him.

Notes to Chapter 4

¶ [1.] Heart (cor): wisdom, which has its seat in the heart, as a result of which the wise are called cordatus. So Martial, Book II, epigram 8.[5–6]:

But if you will think that it wasn’t him but me who has made the errors, then I will suppose that you are devoid of understanding (cordis).

2. Face: shame, which shows itself in the face (os) i.e. countenance (vultus).

3. He-goat: a he-goat’s stench. A catachresis, which is also found in Catullus’ poem on Rufus [69.5–6]:

There’s a bad story going round that is damaging you, that says that a truculent goat is living in the valley beneath your arms.

⁵⁰ Quintilian, VIII.6.26, in a passage which also refers to several other examples used here.

[A6r]

4. & 5. Cup, gold. Here by the foaming cup and full gold you understand it all to mean the wine, with which those vessels are full; but in 'gold' there is a metalepsis: for 'gold' for a cup of gold is a metonymy of the matter.
6. The whole of Anticyra: the whole island's hellebore crop; as if the avarious were insane to the greatest degree, and therefore would have greatest need of this herb with which the brain is purged against insanity.
- 7.⁵¹ Heavens: the heavenly ones, who inhabit the upper air.
8. Earth: men living on earth.
9. Prison: those who were in chains and prison, or those who were worthy of prison. A hyperbole: for the hateful name of prison is worse and more shameful than if he had said 'prisoners' or 'malefactors'.
10. The city: the Trojans, buried in sleep and wine. A metalepsis: 'the city' for Troy is a synecdoche of the genus, and 'Troy' for the Trojans is a metonymy of the subject.
11. Pergama: the Trojans. A metalepsis: 'Pergama', i.e. the citadel of Troy, for Troy itself, is a synecdoche of a part, and 'Troy' for the Trojans is a metonymy of the subject: and this metalepsis follows in [Metamorphoses,] Book XIV [467]:
- ... Pergama feared the Danaan flames.
12. Italy. Here Cicero puts 'Italy', 'Sicily', 'Gaul', 'Spain' for the Italians, Sicilians, Gauls and Spaniards.
13. In other cases. Namely when by the name of the place is signified not the person located there, but the adjuncts or effects of the person located there.
14. Forum. The rhetorical proceedings [or law suits] (actiones) in the forum, on the bench, on the rostra and in the Senate.

⁵¹ Notes 7. and 8. have been transposed to reflect the order in which they come in the English translation.

15. Academy. By Academy, Lyceum, and that college (gymnasium) in the suburb of Tusculum, we understand the teaching made famous in the Academy by Plato, in the Lyceum by Aristotle, and in the Tusculan ['college'] by Cicero. An allegory.
16. Ucalegon: Ucalegon's house.
17. Chez Pompey: at Pompey's house.
18. Chez toi: at your house.
19. From me: from my villa.
20. When: when they are eating up your wealth.
21. Hannibal. Since they were slain by the army of which Hannibal was commander.
22. Reinstated. Cicero thus addresses Piso, the advocate on the opposite side, although [in reality] Caecina said this to Ebutius.
23. Jupiter: a statue of Jupiter.
24. Orpheus: engraved images of Orpheus and the woods.

Chapter 5

METONYMY OF THE ADJUNCT is when things that are subjects are signified by adjuncts.⁵² Eclogues VIII [77]:

[A6v]

Amaryllis, weave three colours (1.) in three knots.

In this way the names of their virtues are used for good men, and of their vices for bad ones, and of many other things for the people to which they are adjunct: [Cicero,] In Catilinam II [11.25]: ‘For on one side fights bashfulness (2.), on the other, impudence; on this, modesty, on that, debauchery; on this, trustworthiness, on that, deceit; on this, piety, on that, sinfulness; on this, constancy, on that, madness; on this, honour, on that, disgrace [...]; and, in a nutshell, justice, temperance, bravery, wisdom, and all the virtues are in a struggle against wickedness, against wantonness, against indolence, against brazenness, against every vice’: which is a very notable allegory.

Of this sort (genus) are those hyperbolic metonymies of Cicero. ‘Plague! (3.) Calamity!’⁵³ ‘Unbelievable audacity!’⁵⁴ and the like. But here the hyperbole is more elevated, since we celebrate men excelling in virtues, vices, and other qualities with the names of those qualities, but rather boldly go even further: as when we extol ‘Aristides not as the Just but as Justice: and indeed more just than justice itself (4.)’⁵⁵ But Silius has a metalepsis more extended in its steps at [Punica] IV [324]:

The Carthaginian leader flies up gleaming in gilded *murex*⁵⁶ (5.), and Virgil too in Aeneid I [700]:

⁵² See Fraunce, Arcadian Rhetorike: ‘A Metonymia of the adjunct, is, when by the adjunct we expresse the subject’ (A6r) [JR]. Cf. Smith, Mysterie: ‘... is when the Adjunct, or that which belongs to any thing, is put for the subject, or thing to which it belongs or is adjoined’ (C3v).

⁵³ In Pisonem 24.56.

⁵⁴ Philippics II.1.4.

⁵⁵ This is placed in italics as a quotation but I have not found the source.

⁵⁶ The sea-snail whose blood was used for the prized Tyrian purple dye.

... and recline on the spread-out *ostrum*⁵⁷ (6.).

In this way an adjunct of time is put for the subjects⁵⁸ in Aeneid I [291]:

Then, with wars put aside, the hard years (7.) will grow soft;

De Senectute [6.20]: ‘clearly rashness belongs to the flourishing age (8.), prudence to old age (9.)’. There is a catachresis here at Aeneid IV [530–31]:

... welcomes night (10.) in her eyes or breast

In this way a sign is put for the thing signified: [Cicero,] Pro Milone [23.61]: ‘to whom [...] the whole pubescence (11.) of Italy’;

Georgics II [495]:

[A7r]

neither the *fascēs*⁵⁹ (12.) of the people nor the purple (13.) of kings swayed him;

Tristia, Book I, elegy 2 [3]:

nor, I pray, subscribe (14.) to great Caesar’s wrath.

This passage of In Pisonem [30.73] expresses a famous point based on an understanding of this metonymy: ‘nevertheless since I reckon you not an Aristarchus (15.) but a Phalaris (16.) of grammar, who do not put a mark on a bad verse, but go after the poet with weapons, I want to know once and for all what it is you object to in this line:

⁵⁷ The blood of the murex.

⁵⁸ ‘the Adjunct of time is put for the persons, or things subject thereunto’ (Smith, Mysterie, who quotes the same line of Virgil, C4v).

⁵⁹ The ceremonial rods and axe carried before the highest republican magistrates.

‘Let arms (17.) yield to the toga⁶⁰

‘– You say (he says) that the greatest general is to yield to the toga. – What, am I to teach you your letters now, you ass? I don’t need words for that, but cudgels: I didn’t say this toga that I’m wearing, nor the arms, shield and sword of such-and-such⁶¹ a general, but “the toga” since it’s an emblem of peace and the life of leisure, as opposed to “arms”, of tumult and war. Speaking in poetic style I wanted this to mean that war and tumult were to yield to peace and the life of leisure’.

In Pro Marcello [5.14] both tropes are joined with their proper words: ‘And my counsels always kept company with peace and the toga, not war and arms’.

This metonymy is also found in epithets; Aeneid I [542]:

... you scorn mortal (18.) arms and [Statius,] Thebaid VIII [3]:

[...] and stirred up the spirits with armed (19.) death.

Notes to Chapter 5

¶ [1.] Three colours: three threads in three different colours, as is stated by the poet a little earlier.

2. Bashfulness. Bashfulness is put here for the bashful,⁶² impudence for the impudent, modesty for the modest, debauchery for fornicators, etc, and in short all the virtues for the virtuous and vices for the wicked. An allegory.

3. Plague: pestilential citizens; men sullied with the calamity of wickedness; men of unbelievable audacity. Hyperbole.

⁶⁰ Cicero, De Consulato Suo, frag. 6.

⁶¹ ‘huius’; modern editions read ‘unius’ (of any one general).

⁶² ve[re]cundis; reading restored from 1597 edition.

4. Justice itself. In the same way ‘more wicked than wickedness itself’, ‘blinder than blindness’, ‘more deformed than deformity’, ‘more thirsty than thirst itself’, and the like: see note 14 to chapter 9.

5. Murex: in a purple robe dyed with ostrum. [A7v] A metalepsis: ‘murex’ for the blood (ostrum) of the murex is a synecdoche of the whole, ‘ostrum’ for the purple colour of ostrum is a metonymy of the subject, and ‘purple colour’ for a cloak of purple colour is a metonymy of the adjunct for the subject.

6. Ostrum. Ostrum, by a similar metalepsis, here signifies a purple couch.

7. Years: those who live in those years.

8. The flourishing age: young people.

9. Old age: old people. So Metamorphoses I [211]:

‘The ill report of the times had reached our ears’ and Pro Marcello [3.9]: ‘No age shall ever be silent concerning your praises’.

10. Night: for sleep which is taken at night. A catachresis.

11. Pubescence: youth, at the age of which the first growth of puberty is an indication.

12. & 13. Fasces, purple. The fasces and the purple are emblems of authority and rule, which two things are here signified by the fasces and the purple; but in ‘the purple’ there is a metalepsis, of the sort seen above in ‘murex’, for ‘purple’ first signifies the sea-creature which is called murex; but this metalepsis is increased by one step, for ultimately the ‘robe of purple colour’ is put for royal authority by this metonymy of the adjunct.

14. Subscribe: assent, for subscription is a sign of assent and approval.

15. Aristarchus. Aristarchus was a grammarian of Alexandria, who though far inferior to Homer, was not afraid to carp impudently at his poems, and to mark as bad those things which found less approval with his stupidity; about whom Ovid wrote in Ex Ponto, Book III, elegy 11.⁶³

But correction is a thing that much more arduous, to the same degree as Homer was greater than Aristarchus.

16. Phalaris. Phalaris was a most cruel tyrant of the Agrigentines, who among other instruments of punishment had a brass bull⁶⁴ into which, as it was scorched by fire below, condemned men were sent who produced a bellowing like that of a bull; and of this the first example was given by Perillus the bronzesmith himself in place of his reward; at length, when his barbarity could no longer be endured, the tyrant too was shut up in the bull in which he had destroyed the others by fire, and burnt alive.

17. Arms. The orator himself explains this trope in the words that follow.

18. Mortal: of mortal men.

19. Armed: of armed soldiers, who were swallowed up by the earth that had burst open, along with their arms and horses.⁶⁵ In the same way, in the same book of Statius [VIII.597–8]:

Nor does fallen Atys with his half-dead cry escape the notice of Menoeceus;

and in the same book [654], confessed her loving lamentation and poured tears onto his wounds.⁶⁶

Also Heroides 2 [116]:

⁶³ III.9.23–4.

⁶⁴ ‘taurum’ for the misprinted ‘taarum’.

⁶⁵ In fact, the end of Statius’ Thebaid VII makes clear it is only one man, Amphiaraus, who perishes with his horses in this way.

⁶⁶ Vulnera: modern editions read ‘lumina’, ‘poured tears into her eyes’.

[A8r]

and [for whom] my chaste belt was undone with deceitful hand;

and in the same poem [141]:

my neck too, which [offered itself] to faithless arms for embracing;

and [Horace,] Odes I.3 [40]:

Jupiter to put aside his wrathful lightning-bolts, that is, of a half-dead man, of a loving maid, of me (a chaste woman), of you (a deceitful and unfaithful man), of wrathful Jupiter himself. This metonymy is common in the poets, and not inelegant: how many times indeed is an epithet, or an adjunct to a concrete (as the logicians call it) subject, which means proper to it, fitted to something pertaining to the subject, as here ‘mortal’, which is an epithet of man, is ascribed to the arms of men; ‘armed’, an epithet of soldiers, to the death of soldiers; ‘half-dead’, an epithet of Atys, whom Aetolus had nearly killed, to his cry; ‘loving’, an epithet of Ismene, to her lamentation; ‘chaste’, an epithet of Phyllis, to her belt; ‘deceitful’ and ‘faithless’, epithets of Demophoon, to his hand and arms; ‘wrathful’, an epithet of Jupiter, to Jove’s lightning-bolts.

IRONY is a trope from one opposite (1.) to its opposite.⁶⁷

This trope has force, along with all its other uses, especially for humour: and in this sort (genus) of irony Cicero, De Oratore II [67.270] is witness that Socrates ‘stands out from the rest for his wit and humanity’:⁶⁸ as a result he was known as ‘ἔιρων’ [eirōn], the dissembler, because he pretended to be an inexperienced man in awe of other philosophers.⁶⁹

And irony is perceived (2.) either through the manner of speaking (pronunciation) or the character (persona) of the speaker, or through the [contrary] nature of the matter: for if any of these things disagrees with the words spoken, it appears that the intention too disagrees with them.⁷⁰ ‘Opposites’ are things disparate (3.) or contrary (4.).

It is IRONY from the DISPARATE when something said about one person is understood to be about another: whether it is affirmed about one of them, as in Eclogues III [10–11]:

Then, I think – when they saw me (5.) attacking Micon’s plantation and his young vines with my wicked knife, or denied about another, as in Metamorphoses XIII [145]:

... nor is there among them (6.) any condemned man or exile,

[A8v] or Seneca, Hercules Furens, Act II [452]:

But he did not (7.) roam, an exile, over every region.

⁶⁷ See Fraunce, Arcadian Rhetorike: ‘Ironia is a Trope, that by naming one contrarie intendeth another’ (A6v) [JR]. Cf. Smith, Mysterie: ‘when one contrary is put for another’ (B1v).

⁶⁸ The curious punctuation in this edition is clearly a misprint (it is a colon in 1597).

⁶⁹ Quoting Quintilian, IX.2.46.

⁷⁰ ‘apparet mentem etiam iisdem dissentire’. Cf 1597: ‘apparet diversam esse voci voluntatem’ (‘it appears that the meaning is different to the word spoken’, quoting Quintilian, VIII.6.54).

IRONY from the CONTRARY (8.) is when one contrary thing is signified by its contrary. Terence, Andria, Act V [846–7]:

Hail, good fellow (9.) [...] You’ve taken proper care.

De Oratore II [65.262]: ‘When Crassus was speaking on behalf of Aculeo, Lamia, a very ugly man, came up against Aculeo: and when he interrupted annoyingly, Crassus said, “Let’s hear the pretty boy”; and when this got a laugh, Lamia said, “I could do nothing to shape my appearance, but I could shape my wit”; then at this he said, “Let’s hear the eloquent one”, and this got a much more powerful laugh’.

Aeneid I [542–3] is a catachresis:

If you scorn the human race and mortal arms, hope (10.) then that the gods are mindful of right and wrong.

The same at Georgics IV [91]:

The one will be burning with spots rough (11.) with gold.

Metalepsis (12.)⁷¹ occurs very frequently. But prolonged irony makes an allegory more elegant. [Cicero,] In Clodium:⁷² ‘Your integrity has cleared you, (believe me) your modesty has rescued you, your previous life has saved you’.

Aeneid IV [93–5]:

Oh, you’ve carried off a fine (13.) victory and ample spoils, you and your son, and a great name worthy of memory,⁷³
if one woman has been defeated by a trick of two gods!

⁷¹ Misprinted as (1.) in the text.

⁷² A fragment, quoted by Quintilian, VIII.6.56.

⁷³ ‘magnum et memorabile nomen’ (cf. Metamorphoses X.608); modern editions of Virgil read ‘numen’: ‘a great and memorable display of divine power’.

Here the disagreement of the words with both the character (persona) (14.), and the matter (15.), and the manner of speaking (pronunciatio) (16.), if the oration is well delivered, is plain to see.

There is also an irony which is called by some PARALEPSIS,⁷⁴ as in these formulas: ‘I pass over’, ‘I leave to one side’.

*Pro Pompeio*⁷⁵ [9.25]: ‘Citizens, in this place allow me to (as the poets who write Roman history do) pass over (17.) our disaster, which was so great that it came to the ears of Lucius Lucullus brought not by a messenger from the battle but by the noise of common talk’.

Aeneid X [36–8]:

Why should I repeat the tale of their ships, burnt on the shores of Eryx?

[A9r] Or the king of storms and the raging winds roused to fury in Aeolia, or Iris sent forth from the clouds?

[Cicero,] Pro Cluentio [66.188]: ‘I leave aside (18.) the first injury done to him by lust: I leave aside the iniquitous marriage to her son-in-law: I leave aside the daughter driven out of matrimony by her mother’s greed’.

Finally, there is a use of irony which is called APOPHASIS, not unlike (19.) paralepsis.⁷⁶ In Verrem I:⁷⁷ ‘Nor do I say those things (20.) which were I to say them, you could not refute, ... There are in you these and many other signs of a false accuser, of which I make no use’.

Notes to Chapter 6

¶ [1.] Opposite. Thus [Petrus] Ramus himself at the end of chapter 16⁷⁸ of Scholae Rhetoricae, but he does not say ‘from a contrary to its contrary’; in the way [Audemarus] Talaueus defines it, he excludes irony from the disparate.

⁷⁴ Or paralipsis (Greek: paraleipsis) Butler uses both spellings in this chapter. In the margin, ‘Praeteritio’.

⁷⁵ See note above.

⁷⁶ In margin, along with the Greek: ‘Negatio’.

⁷⁷ Now numbered as In Caecilium 9.29.

⁷⁸ In fact, Book XVI.

2. Is perceived. Thus Fabius [Quintilian], Book VIII, chapter 6 [54].
3. Disparate (disparata). Things that are disparate are any that are different by nature, and therefore one thing can equally be opposed to many.
4. Contrary (contraria). Things that are contrary are those by nature in opposition to each other, and therefore one thing can only be opposed to one.
5. Me. Menalcas names himself but means Dam[o]etas.
6. Nor is there among them. Arguing against Ajax, Ulysses says that no one of his own family was condemned or exiled: but without saying so he is finding fault with Ajax, whose father, Telamon and uncle, Peleus went into exile because they had slain a third brother, Phocas.
7. But he did not. So says Lycus to Amphitryon, speaking about Apollo, but implying the contrary about Hercules.
8. Irony from the contrary. Irony from the contrary can be one of four types: for things that are contrary can be related, adverse, contradictory or privative.⁷⁹ Irony from the related: as if a father says to his troublesome and insolent son, 'Well then, you be my father and I'll be your son, and I'll obey you as I ought'. From the adverse: 'pretty boy' (see above). From the contradictory: 'I will not plead against you with the full force of the law':⁸⁰ here we may also call it paralepsis and apophasis. From the privative: is someone should say of a rich man, 'The man, believe me, is poor and needy'.
9. Good fellow. So Simo ironically addresses Davos, meaning that he is a criminal who has done most wickedly.
10. Hope: be afraid, as in Aeneid IV [419]:

⁷⁹ 'relata, adversa, contradicentia, privantia'. Smith, Mysterie, does not use these terms or refer to this quartet. Cf Cicero, Topics 11.47–9, which Butler seems not to be following.

⁸⁰ Quintilian, IX.2.47.

[A9v] If I was able to hope for this great sorrow.

11. Rough (squalentibus): gleaming (splendentibus). There is a catachresis in these words: for ‘to hope for sorrow’ and to be ‘rough with gold’ are so incongruous that you will scarcely find them elsewhere.⁸¹

12. Metalepsis: for ‘integrity’, ‘cleared’ and ‘I pass over’ (see below) are metaphors. ‘I use’ (see last quotation in chapter) is a kind (genus) of synecdoche, for ‘I make mention’ or ‘I press the point’.

13. Fine. This is no praise, rather a shameful disgrace and infamous behaviour.

14. Character. For the words are those of Juno to Venus and Cupid, whom she held in the highest degree of odium, and whom she should therefore treat with vitriol rather than with praise.

15. Matter. For it is an easy thing for an unwarlike woman to be vanquished by two gods, nor is it worthy of the slightest praise.

16. Manner of speaking (pronunciatio). For one manner of delivery is suitable for straightforward speaking, another for ironic; which however is occasionally not used when either the character or the nature of the matter is sufficient to demonstrate the irony.

17. Pass over. The speaker pretends to pass over his side’s disaster, which however he could not have described more expressively.

18. I leave aside. Here as above some things are said in pretence to have been passed over, which are however clearly related: and here the series of three ironies makes it an allegory.

19. Not unlike. For there is no difference except in the manner of speaking them, while the matter and sense are exactly the same.

20. Nor do I say those things. Here, ‘Nor do I say those things’ and ‘I make no use’ employ the same apophasis.

⁸¹⁸¹ This sentence replaces another in 1597; there are also changes in the main text around here.

METAPHOR⁸² is a trope from like (1.) to like.⁸³

And therefore the likeness is confined to one word. But no trope is more vigorous than metaphor, nor is there any that brings more illumination to a speech, especially if it is employed with reason and applied to the senses, above all that of vision which is the most acute of the senses. For both the ‘scent (2.) of refinement’, and the ‘softness of humanity’, and the ‘murmur of the sea’, and the ‘sweetness of speech’⁸⁴ are drawn from the other senses: but that of the eyes is much the brighter. Ad Atticum, Book IV, letter 16⁸⁵: ‘We have lost, dear Pomponius [Atticus], not only all the sap (3.) and blood, but even the complexion (4.) and appearance of the authentic state’; In Catilinam III [10.24]: ‘And then with the killing of the most excellent men, the lights (5.) of the state were put out’. And it is for this reason that ‘I sniff out’ (6.) or ‘scent’, ‘I grasp’, ‘I have a taste’ and ‘I hear’ are now and then put for ‘I understand’; but ‘I see’, ‘I recognise’, and ‘I perceive’ very often.

[A10r] Now there is nothing in the universe from which a simile cannot be drawn; and therefore a metaphor too.⁸⁶

[Cicero,] Pro Sestio [69.144]: ‘whose father I acknowledge to be the god (7.) and parent of my fortune and good name’. [Cicero,] Tusculan Disputations I [2.4]: ‘honour nourishes the arts and all are inflamed (8.) in their endeavours by the idea of glory’;

Metamorphoses I [2–3]:

... Gods, breathe (9.) favourably on what I have begun ...;

Aeneid IV [532]:

⁸² In the margin, ‘Translatio’.

⁸³ See Fraunce, Arcadian Rhetorike: ‘A Metaphore is when the like is signified by the like: so then a Metaphore is nothing but a similitude contracted into one word’ (B1v) [JR].

⁸⁴ All quoted from De Oratore III.40.161.

⁸⁵ IV.16.10, now numbered IV.18.2.

⁸⁶ Cf. De Oratore III.40.161.

... and ebbs and flows⁸⁷ (10.) on a great billow of angers;

De Oratore II [65.261]: ‘as you sow (11.), so shall you reap’.

There is a catachresis at Eclogues VII [7]:

the man of the flock (12.), the he-goat himself, had strayed

Quintilian, VIII.6 [17]: ‘the snows (13.) of the head’.

Here we have one of the orator’s (14.) precepts. De Oratore: ‘If you are worried that a metaphor appear a little too harsh, it is often to be softened by a phrase added to it, such as “so to speak” or “if one may say so”, or a similar formula: as if, in the old days when Marcus Cato had died, someone were to say that the Senate were left “an orphan”, that were a little harsh; but “so to speak an orphan”, it would be softened somewhat’.

There is a metalepsis at De Oratore III [41.163]: ‘the Syrtis (15.) of his inheritance, [...] the Charybdis of his fortune’, and in Quintilian, Book X, chapter 1 [79]: ‘Isocrates [...] sought out all the Venuses (16.) of oratory’. But it is hyperbole and allegory that receive particular praise in metaphors: and a hyperbolic metaphor gives rise to a wonderful loftiness of speech when we give things (17.) that lack sentience some agency and will. Aeneid I [162–3]:

... twin crags rise threateningly into the sky (18.) ...

... Araxes, resentful (19.) of its bridge.

Likewise Pro Marcello [3.10]: ‘By heaven it seems to me the walls of this Senate-house are straining to give you thanks, Gaius Caesar’. So on the other hand [Cicero,] Brutus [15.58]: ‘Some orators don’t speak: they bark (20.)’, and In Pisonem [28.69]: ‘And so this stud stallion, as soon as he’d heard sensual pleasures praised so highly by a philosopher, [...] whinnied (21.) his assent to this speech of his’.

⁸⁷ ‘fluctuat’ for the misprinted ‘stuctuat’.

[A10v] Here we have some exceedingly famous allegories: In Catilinam III [11.26]: ‘In your memory, citizens, this case of mine will be cherished; it will grow in your talking; in the monuments of literature it will grow old and strong’; In Verrem IV:⁸⁸ ‘That man came into the forum on fire with criminal intent [...], his eyes blazed, cruelty shone out of his whole face’; In Pisonem [9.20–21]: ‘Nor was I (22.) so fearful, as one who had steered the ship of the republic in the greatest storms and surges, and brought it safe to harbour, that I was frightened of the little cloud on your brow (23.) or your colleague’s polluted breath. For my part I had my eye on other winds; in my mind I foresaw other squalls; and I did not give in to those other impending dangers’.

Notes to Chapter 7

¶ [1.] From like. Every metaphor, since it is nothing other than a short and hidden likeness, is resolved and explained by an adverb of comparison: ‘just as’, ‘as if’, ‘like’, etc.

2. Scent. Here ‘like a scent’, ‘like softness’, ‘like a murmur’, ‘like sweetness’ are understood.

3. & 4. Sap, complexion: law and order; for justice and the observance of the laws is like the sap and blood of the state, and civil and outward behaviour is like its complexion and appearance.

5. Lights: because they shine and are famous like lights. In the same way [Cicero, Ad Familiares,] Book XII, letter 5 to Cassius: ‘but now I hope that from those Eastern lands the fame of your virtue may shine forth’.

6. Sniff out. Here things that are proper to the senses and particularly to that of sight are translated to denote the agency of the intellect; ‘I sniff out’ (odoror): Cicero, Ad Atticum Book IV, letter 77:⁸⁹ ‘I should like you to sniff out from Fabius (if you have an entrée to him) and get a taste of that dinner-companion of yours’; ‘I scent’ (olfacio): Terence, Adelphoe, Act III [396–7]:

Wouldn’t I have scented it six whole months before he started anything?;

‘I grasp’ (teneo): Terence, Heautontimorumenos, Act IV [700]:

⁸⁹ Now numbered IV.8a.4.

Do you grasp what I'll say?;

'I have a taste' (gusto): Cicero, In Pisonem [24.58]: 'He had no taste for that philosophy of yours'; 'I hear' (audio): [Terence,] The Eunuch [370–71]:

PARMENO: You, put on his dress. – CHAEREA: His dress? – PA. I'll take you instead of him. – CH. I hear you, i.e. I understand why I should put on the Eunuch's dress; the proper word ('I understand', intellego) follows.⁹⁰ 'I see' (video): Cicero, [Ad familiares,] Book VI [3], to Torquatus: 'But the result is the same and the end of it is the same, both what I see in my mind's eye and what we recognise with our eyes'; 'I recognise' (cerno): Cicero, De Finibus, Book I [19.64]: 'Moreover whatever we recognise with our mind comes out of our sense-perception'; [A11r] 'I perceive' (perspicio): De Finibus, Book II [3.10]: 'I do not wholly perceive what this "variety" is'.

7. God. Here 'like the god and parent' is understood.

8. Are inflamed. They are so incited to ardent endeavour that they seem to be in some way ablaze; a metaphor from fire.

9. Breathe: give a favourable wind (secundate), as when following winds breathe on sails; a metaphor from air.

10. Ebbs and flows. She is taken uncertainly hither and thither as if on the swell of the sea; a metaphor from water, as Aeneid VIII [19]:

... he ebbs and flows on a great billow of cares.

11. As you sow: you will be rewarded appropriately for your deeds. See [Erasmus, Adagia,] Chilias 1, centuria 8 [78].⁹¹ This double metaphor, which makes an allegory, is drawn from earth.

12. Man of the flock. By a rather gentle metaphor, the he-goat of the flock, i.e. the breeding male, which is mostly known by the one name 'billy-goat'.

⁹⁰ i.e. later in line 371.

⁹¹ i.e. 778.

13. Snows. Snowy or white hair; a catachresis, since the metaphor seems rather harsh. Horace has the same metaphor at Odes IV.13 [12].

14. Orator's. De Oratore, Book III [41.165].

[15.] Syrtis. A metalepsis: for 'Syrtis' for a rock and 'Charybdis' for a whirlpool is a species of synecdoche, and 'the rock of his inheritance' or 'the whirlpool of his fortune' for an extravagant spender, who wastes away and as it were devours his inheritance and fortune, is a metaphor; but in 'Syrtis and Charybdis' there is something of a catachresis: I should (says the same orator) preferred to have said 'rock' and 'whirlpool'.⁹²

16. Venuses: graces. A metalepsis: 'Venus' for 'loveliness' (venustas) is a metonymy of the efficient (see note 13 to Chapter 2) and 'loveliness' for grace and sweetness of speech is a metaphor.

17. When we give things. So advises Aristotle, Rhetoric, Book 3, chapter 11 [3], and after him Quintilian, Book VIII, chapter 6 [11].

18. Rise threateningly into the sky. Obviously they rise up to such a height that they seem to touch the heavens.

19. Resentful. The Araxes, a river of Armenia, is said to have overturned with its flood a great bridge erected by Alexander.

20. They bark. They speak as if barking, since they speak contrary to reason.

21. Whinnied. He made a noise as if whinnying, since like a lustful stallion with his neighing, this man with his wanton laughter made clear his bestial appetite for sensual pleasure. Both metaphors [20. & 21.] contain a meiosis: for the former is drawn from the natural speech of dogs, as the latter is from horses; in this way we say by a meiosis that a man brays, which is the speech of donkeys, grunts, the speech of pigs, yelps, of foxes, howls, of wolves, etc., when we want to depreciate his speech, or hold it up for its worthlessness. For as when we attribute sentience, reason and speech to inanimate objects, it is a hyperbolic auxesis, so when we impute to a man possessed of reason the voices of animals, it is a hyperbolic tapinosis. [A11v] But in the latter example, ‘stallion’ and ‘whinnied’ also make an allegory.

22. Nor was I. This is a famous allegory extended to many words: there is a similar one in Horace, Odes XIV [1ff.]:

O ship [of state], fresh tides are carrying you back to sea. O what are you doing? Get stoutly into harbour! (etc.)

23. Your brow. The ‘little cloud on your brow’ and ‘polluted breath’ have a hyperbolic overstatement.

Chapter 8

SYNECDOCHE⁹³ is a trope of a part to the whole, or the other way round.⁹⁴ And the ‘part’ is a member or species.

SYNECDOCHE OF THE MEMBER is when the whole is signified by a member. Andria, Act II [371]:

Silly head (1.);

Aeneid II [118–19]:

and made offering for with an Argive soul (2.);

in the same book [251]:

rolling over earth and pole of heaven (3.) with its great shadow;

In prose ‘a blade’ (mucro)⁹⁵ for ‘a sword’ is acceptable, and ‘a roof’ (tectum) for ‘a house’, but not (4.) ‘a stern’ (puppis) for ‘a ship’ or ‘fir’ for ‘planks’.⁹⁶ At Sermones I, satire I [114] a catachresis is used:

as when the hoof (5.) bears away the chariots let out from the starting-gates;

but at Eclogue I [69] a metalepsis:

After a few grains (6.), will I behold my realm in wonder?

as at Metamorphoses I [484]:

⁹³ In margin, ‘comprehensio, intellectio’.

⁹⁴ See Fraunce, Arcadian Rhetorike: ‘Synecdoche [of the part] is when the name of the whole is given to the part, or the name of the part to the whole’ (B5r) [JR].

⁹⁵ Lit. ‘sharp edge’ or ‘point’.

⁹⁶ See above, chapter 2, (Butler’s) note 18.

‘Blushing over her fair features (7.) with shame-faced red’.

There is a hyperbole at Aeneid II [644]:

Say your farewells to my body (8.) lying thus, thus, and leave, and an allegory at In Catilinam I [8.19]: ‘that I could in no way be safe in the same four walls (9.) as you, when I was in great danger because we were held within the same city-walls’, and ibid. [2.6]: ‘The eyes and ears (10.) of many will be watching over you and observing you unawares, as they have done up till now’.

[A12r] In this manner a singular number (11.) is used for plural at Aeneid II [290]:

The enemy (12.) holds the walls, Troy collapses from its high rooftops, and another at De Oratore I [8.32]: ‘What is so necessary as always to bear arms with which you can (13.) be defended?’

Notes to Chapter 8

¶ [1.] Head: for man.

[2.] An Argive soul: for a Greek man.

3. Pole of heaven: for the heaven itself, of which the Pole is a very small part.

4. But not. The words are Quintilian’s, Book VIII, chapter 6 [20]. And so ‘stern’ (puppis), the hinder part of a ship, for ship, although frequent enough in poetry, is nevertheless a catachresis in prose; of this sort is also ‘keel’, the lower part of a ship. Ovid has both in the same couplet at Heroides 2 [45–6]:

Ah, mad as I was, I even rebuilt your mangled sterns,
So there would be a sturdy keel with which you could desert me.

5. Hoof. The horse’s hoof (ungula) for the horse itself, since it seems a rather harsh and unbalanced metaphor, is a catachresis.

6. Grains (aristae): years. A metalepsis. ‘Grain’ for an ear of corn is a synecdoche of the member, ‘ear of corn’ for the cornfield is again a synecdoche of the member, ‘cornfield’ for summer, at which time of year it grows abundantly, is a metonymy of the subject for the adjunct; ‘summer’ for year is again a synecdoche of the member for the whole.
7. Features (ora)⁹⁷: face. A metalepsis: ‘features’ (ora) for a feature (os) is a synecdoche of plural for singular, and ‘a feature’ for the whole face is a synecdoche of the member.
8. Body. Anchises speaks here of himself; but in this word there is a certain meiosis: for he means to signify that he is a man almost destitute of soul and life.
9. Four walls. Here we are to understand ‘four walls (parietes)’ is used for house, and city-walls (moenia) for the city.
10. Eyes and ears: for men who have eyes and ears.
11. In this manner a singular number. Petrus Ramus teaches us in Scholae Rhetoricae, Book XVI, that a plural is something whole, and that a singular is one part of it; but nowhere does he say that the former is the genus of the latter, or that the latter is a species of the former (as Talaueus seems to think): however by a ‘part’ (pars) he understands nothing other than a member (membrum), for which by synecdoche of the genus it is very often used, in same way as ‘all’ (totum) is used for the whole (integrum). And so a singular is a part or member, and not a plural species, especially when the whole is a multitude composed of unities as if out of little parts.
12. The enemy: enemies.
13. You can: we can, or anyone can.

⁹⁷ Os, ‘mouth’, was used in both singular and plural (ora) to mean ‘face’.

[A12v]

Chapter 9

SYNECDOCHE OF THE SPECIES is when a genus is signified by a species.⁹⁸ Georgics I [8–9]:

exchanged the Chaonian acorn (1.) for the fat grain of wheat, and mixed cups of Achelous' water (2.) with new-invented grape-wine.

There is a catachresis at In Catilinam I [12.29]: 'There was certainly nothing to be afraid of on my part that if this parricide (3.) of citizens should be killed it would redound at all discredibly for me in posterity', and Aeneid II [15–16]:

... they built (4.) a horse by Athena's divine skill, and also in Sermones II, satire 3 [9]:

And yet your face was that of one who threatened (5.) many splendid things.

In this way we talk of an 'infinite' (6.) number for a great; De Oratore II [22.94]: 'and from this school, as from the Trojan horse, innumerable (7.)⁹⁹ heroes emerged', and Cicero, De Divinatione II [14.34]: 'Six hundred (8.) examples of this kind can be produced', where there is a metalepsis. A hyperbole (9.) is rather common here, when the special [i.e. of the species, kind or type] name of some thing that is outstanding in its genus is put for the general. Juvenal, Satires II [1–3]:

I'd gladly flee from here to beyond the Sarmatians and the icy Ocean (10.), every time they dare talk morality, those people who pretend to be the Curii (11.) but live a life of Bacchic orgies (12.).

⁹⁸ See Fraunce, Arcadian Rhetorike: 'The Synecdoche of the speciall is when by the speciall [a species, kind or type] we note the generall, so we put a finite number for a great one; so the singuler for the plurall' (B6r) [JR].

⁹⁹ Innumeri. Modern editions read 'meri' (only).

Likewise Tristia, Book I, elegy 2 [19–22]:

Wretched me, how high those mountains of water roll!
One minute you think they will touch the highest stars (13.);
The sea opens up and how great are the valleys that drop away?
The next you think they're about to touch the black depths of Hell (14.).

But it is quite bold, when we say that even those singularities are exceeded by something. Tristia, Book III, elegy 11 [39–40]:

You are more savage (15.) than unhappy Busiris (16.), more savage than him (17.) who slowly scorched the fake bull in the fire.

There is an allegory at [Cicero,] De Lege Agraria II [24.64]: 'both when this Republic had Lucini (18.), Calatini, Acidini, men decorated not only with the honours of the people and their own deeds but also with the [B1r] endurance of poverty; and then when the Catos came, the Philippi, the Laelii, whose wisdom and moderation in public and private affairs, in forensic and domestic matters, you will have recognised: nevertheless a commission of this sort was never given to anyone',¹⁰⁰ and Martial, Book VIII, epigram 56¹⁰¹ [5]:

If there are Maecenases (19.), Flaccus, then Maros won't be lacking;
And your own countryside, even, will give you a Virgil.

Notes to Chapter 9

¶[1.] & 2. Chaonian acorn, cups of Achelous' water. The region of Chaonia¹⁰² is very abundant in acorns; Achelous is a river flowing beside it. But here the poet signifies, by 'Chaonian acorn' and 'cups of Achelous' water', acorns and water in general. But in the latter trope there is a metalepsis, for 'cups of Achelous' water' for Achelous' water itself is a metonymy of the subject, and 'Achelous' water' for any water is a synecdoche of the species.

¹⁰⁰ Various modifications have been made to this text in more modern editions.

¹⁰¹ Or 55 in some numberings.

¹⁰² In Epirus (North-West Greece and Albania).

3., 4. & 5. Parricide, built, threatened. A parricide, properly defined, is one who has killed his father, but is here put catachretically for a killer: where it is also an auxesis or exaggerating hyperbole, since it employs a more drastic word than the deed answers for. 'To build' (aedificare) properly signifies to build a house, but here simply to build. 'To threaten' (minari) is used here for 'to promise', as in a synecdoche of the genus 'to promise' (promittere) is used for to threaten. In all these, since the substitution seems rather harsh and inelegant, there is a catachresis.

6. Infinite. Not without a hyperbolic auxesis.

7. Innumerable: many.

8. Six hundred:¹⁰³ very many. A metalepsis; for there is a twofold synecdoche: 'six hundred' for innumerable is the first modification (modus), 'innumerable' for many is the second modification. This is a familiar metalepsis, as in Plautus' Aulularia [320]:

There are six hundred things I could mention, if there was time enough.

'A thousand' and 'a hundred' not uncommonly also have this meaning by the same metalepsis: as Eclogues II [21]:

I have a thousand ewes wandering the Sicilian hills, and Aeneid V [88–9]:

... as a rainbow draws¹⁰⁴ a thousand different colours through the clouds opposite the sun;

Aeneid III [643–4]:

a hundred other unspeakable Cyclopes dwell all over by these curved shores and wander in the high mountains;

¹⁰³ Used idiomatically as we might say 'hundreds' or 'thousands'.

¹⁰⁴ trahit. Modern editions read iacit, 'throws'.

and Aeneid VI [625]:

not if I had a hundred tongues and a hundred mouths.

[B1v]

9. This hyperbole is commonly called antonomasia: see note 6 to chapter 11.

10., 11. & 12. ‘Sarmatians and the icy Ocean’, ‘the Curii’ and ‘Bacchic orgies’ is an auxesis, for here, where remote places, temperate men and any kind of intemperance are to be understood, the exaggerated names of those species are used which are most outstanding in these genera: and here the series of four tropes makes an allegory. So ‘Epicurus’ is used for a voluptuary, ‘Aristides’ for a just man, ‘Croesus’ for a rich man, ‘Sardanapalus’ for an effeminate, ‘Midas’ for a greedy, ‘Thersites’ for a deformed, ‘a Carthaginian’ (Poenus) for a perfidious: which is auxesis; and so ‘Irus’ and ‘Codrus’ for a poor man, ‘a pygmy’ or ‘a dwarf’ for a man of short stature, which is tapinosis, or a hyperbole of diminution.

13. & 14. Stars, Hell. ‘Stars’ for the highest, and ‘Hell’ (Tartarus) for the lowest, in which is both an auxesis and an allegory.

15. You are more savage, etc. Thus Eclogue VII [37–8]:

Galatea, daughter of Nereus, sweeter to me than the thyme of Hybla, whiter than swans, prettier than white ivy

Where ‘more savage than Busiris’, ‘more savage than Phalaris’, ‘sweeter than the thyme’, ‘whiter than swans’, ‘prettier than ivy’ are rather bold auxeses: examples of which are innumerable, and have passed into proverbs, as:

older than Iapetus, Chronus and the Titans, Chaos and Saturn thirstier than a sponge whiter than snow chaster than Milanion or Hippolytus richer than Crassus or Croesus more learned than Prodicus more cunning than Ulysses more eloquent than Nestor more magnanimous than Codrus more convoluted than the Labyrinth more wrathful than the Adriatic more talkative than a turtle-dove, the sea-shore, or a crag¹⁰⁵ louder than Stentor brighter than amber more lying than a Cretan softer than the inner ear¹⁰⁶ more changeable than Empusa or Proteus blacker than pitch or a scarab beetle more perfidious than a Carthaginian more far-sighted than Lynceus¹⁰⁷ more full of fat than an oil-lantern stronger than Milo cleaner than a fish wiser than Socrates sterner than Cato more malleable than wax fleeter than Pegasus livelier than a stag or crow

¹⁰⁵ Erasmus, from whom many if not all items on this list are derived, explains (Adagia 2553) that this is a rocky crag surrounded by waves.

¹⁰⁶ Cf. Cicero, Ad Quintum Fratrem, II.13.4 ('auricula infima mollior').

¹⁰⁷ Apuleius, Metamorphoses II.22.8.

more vocal than a nightingale greedier than the *murex*¹⁰⁸, etc.

[B2r]

But the following:

blinder than Tiresias, a mole, or a snake's sloughed skin more ignorant than Philonides more useless than a fool skinnier than Leotrophides or Philetas more naked than a snake's sloughed skin poorer than Irus or Codrus rarer than the Phoenix more harshly enslaved than Messene more foolish than Gryllus, Coroebus, Melitides, Morychus stupider than lead slower than a snail or a tortoise more cowardly than Pisander or Epeus more worthless than a Carian and the like, are meioses: for the comparison belittles them the more in their defects. It is out of hyperboles of this kind that Polyphemus made his love-song in Metamorphoses XIII [789–807]:

¹⁰⁸ The sea-creature from which purple dye was obtained (see above, chapter 5). Erasmus (Adagia 1284), quoting Pliny (NH IX.36 = IX.60.128) explains that the voraciousness comes from the tongue, a finger long, which the murex inserts into other sea creatures to suck them dry.

Galatea! Whiter than the leaf of the snowy privet, fuller of flowers than a meadow,¹⁰⁹ nobler than the great alder, more shining than glass, more frolicsome than a young goat, lighter than the shells worn thin by the constant sea,
 more pleasant than winter suns and summer shade, nobler than berries,¹¹⁰ more remarkable than the tall plane, more sparkling than ice, sweeter than a ripe grape, softer than the down of a swan and curdled milk too,
 and, if you don't run away, prettier than a watered garden.
 But the same Galatea! Fiercer than untamed bullocks, harder than an aged oak, more deceptive than the waves, more unbreakable than both willow's twigs and the white vine, more immovable than these crags, more impetuous than a river, more puffed up in praise than a peacock, fiercer than fire, crueller than thorns, more savage than a pregnant bear, more unhearing than the waters, more pitiless than a snake underfoot, and, which I'd particularly like to lose if I could,¹¹¹
 you can flee me faster not just than a stag driven on by loud baying, but even than the winds and the rushing breeze.

16. Busiris. Busiris, son of Neptune, was a terrible tyrant over the Egyptians, was in the habit of sacrificing guests to Jupiter; but when he laid the same trap for Hercules, he was killed by him, along with his son Amphidamas and the ministers of the altar.

17. Him. He refers to Phalaris, about whom see [chapter 5, above,] on metonymy of the adjunct.

¹⁰⁹ prato. Modern editions read pratis (meadows).

¹¹⁰ Nobilior pomis. Modern editions read mobiliior damma, more fleet than a doe; but John Gay knew this old reading and used it to great effect in Acis and Galatea.

¹¹¹ Et, quod praecipuè, si possem, demere vellem. Modern editions read: 'and, which I particularly wish I could lose about you'.

18. Lucinus. In this allegory the meaning of the tropes is immediately explained by the orator.

19. Maecenases. Here 'Maros' and 'Virgils'¹¹² refer to learned men, and 'Maecenases' to the patrons of the learned.

¹¹² Referring to the same poet, P. Vergilius Maro.

[B2v]

Chapter 10

Synecdoche of the whole is when a part is signified by the whole; it is [a synecdoche] of the integer, or of the genus.¹¹³

SYNECDOCHE OF THE INTEGER is when a member is signified by the whole. Aeneid I [473]:

They had tasted the food (1.) of Troy and drunk Xanthus (2.).

In [Ad Familiares,] Book IV, letter 1 there is a metalepsis: ‘You see how things stand: now the commands have been handed out, the whole world (3.) burns for war’, and also at Aeneid I [114–15]:

... a huge sea (4.) from on high strikes onto the stern

There is a hyperbole at Philippics II [25.63]: ‘this master of the horse, for whom to bring up wind in public would be a matter of shame, throwing up, filled his own lap and the whole judgement-seat (5.) with bits of food stinking of wine’.

In this manner a plural number (6.) is used for a singular; [Cicero] to Brutus:¹¹⁴ ‘We (7.) deceived the people, and seemed to be orators’; Tristia I, elegy 1:¹¹⁵

She knows nothing of bodies (8.) tossed on a vast sea, driven by the winds – she doesn’t know; doesn’t know death approaches.

Notes to chapter 10

¹¹³ See Fraunce, Arcadian Rhetorike: ‘The Synecdoche of the whole, is when by the whole we meane a part, and it is either of the integrall whole, or generall and uniuersall. Of the integrall, when by the whole integrall we meane a part’ (B6v) [JR].

¹¹⁴ Not in Cicero’s surviving letters Ad Brutum, but quoted by Quintilian, VIII.6.20 and 55.

¹¹⁵ Tristia I.2.39–40.

¶ [1. &] 2. Food, Xanthus: part of the food, part of the River Xanthus, not the whole of the food, and not the whole Xanthus. So Eclogues I [62]:

the Parthian drink the Araris¹¹⁶ or the Germans the Tigris.

3. World (orbis terrarum): the Roman Empire. A metalepsis: ‘circle of the world’ (orbis) for the globe is a synecdoche of the member for the integer, and the ‘globe of the earth’ (globus terrae) for part of the globe, such as the Roman Empire, is the contrary synecdoche, of the integer for the member.

4. Sea (Pontus): wave. A metalepsis: as ‘Pontus’, the son of Nereus and Doris, for that part of the sea which extends from the swamp of Maeotis as far as the island of Tenedos in the Aegean Sea¹¹⁷ is a metonymy of the efficient; the ‘Pontic Sea’ for the whole sea is a synecdoche of the member for the whole; and ‘the sea’ for a body of water¹¹⁸ or wave of the sea is the contrary synecdoche of the integer for the member.

5. The whole judgement-seat (tribunal). There is an auxesis here in order to exaggerate the disgustingness of the deed.

6. A plural number. See [above, chapter 8, on] synecdoche of the member.

7. We. The orator speaks only of himself.

8. Bodies. The poet means [B3r] his own body; he bewails the fact that it was now being tossed around in such a crisis, and says that his wife knew nothing of it. The same word appears in the same poem [91]:

Carry my body (corpora) on, you swift-blowing winds (what can I do here?):

Why does my boat see¹¹⁹ the shores of Italy?

¹¹⁶ Or Arar: now the Saône.

¹¹⁷ See chapter 2, Butler’s note 6.

¹¹⁸ vada: not a classical usage.

¹¹⁹ vident: modern editions read volunt, ‘desire’.

Chapter 11

SYNECDOCHE OF THE GENUS is when the species is signified by the genus.¹²⁰ Aeneid II [390]:

... when it comes to enemies, who would ask if it were deceit or virtue (1.)?;

In Catilinam II [1.1]: ‘without doubt we have ruined the man (2.)’; In Verrem II [1.42]: ‘what hope have you left for so pernicious,¹²¹ so dangerous an animal (3.)?’

In this way we say that something ‘has lived’ (4.) and ‘has been’ (5.) when we understand it to be now dead, and not to exist. Aeneid II [325–6]:

... we Trojans have been; Troy has been, and the mighty glory of the Teucrians.

But this synecdoche is rather elegant when something that is pre-eminent in its genus is signified *par excellence*¹²² (6.) by the general name. So Tydides and Pelides (7.) for Diomedes and Achilles. So ‘the poet’ (8.) for Homer or Virgil, or ‘the orator’ (9.) for Demosthenes or Tullius Cicero. There is a catachresis at Aeneid II [596–7]:

Will you not first look where you left your parent (10.), Anchises, exhausted with age?;

and Aeneid I:¹²³

I promised (11.) to be an avenger.

‘Error’ (erratum, 12.) for ‘crime’ (scelus) is a hyperbole. Allegory is also frequent here; In Catilinam I [5.12]: ‘the consul bids the enemy leave the city (13.)’

¹²⁰ See Fraunce, Arcadian Rhetorike: ‘The Synecdoche of the generall is when by the generall we intend the speciall’ (B7v) [JR].

¹²¹ Modern editions read perfidiosum, perfidious.

¹²² κατ’ ἐξοχὴν (kat’ exokhēn).

¹²³ In fact, II.96.

And¹²⁴ these things concerning tropes [should be borne in mind]: if they are considered in terms of rank and excellence, the chief by far is metaphor; then comes irony; the third will be metonymy, and in last place synecdoche. The most frequent usage also is that of metaphor, then of metonymy, then synecdoche, and the rarest [B3v] is irony. This reasoning (inductio) is provided by an attentive reading of eight consular speeches of Cicero by Petrus Ramus. But three species in particular, metonymy, metaphor and synecdoche, are often joined together. In Pisonem [22.52]: ‘That one (14.) day seemed to me like immortality, [...] when I saw the Senate and the entire Roman people come out: when Rome itself seemed almost pulled up from its foundations to come out to embrace its saviour; and it received me in such a way that not only men and women of every kind, age and rank, no matter their wealth or dwelling, but even the very city-walls and roofs of the city, its temples too, seemed to rejoice’. And this was the finest cookery and embellishment¹²⁵ of the oratorical style of rhetoric.

Notes to chapter 11

¶ [1.] Virtue: valour.

2. Man. He says ‘man’ for Catiline.

3. Animal. The orator says ‘animal’ (animal) for wild beast (bestia).

4. & 5. Has lived, has been (vixisse, fuisse). ‘They have lived’, ‘they were’ and words of this sort seem to encompass something of the general in themselves; for what ‘were’, either were and only were and are no more, or both were and still are. Therefore when [in the quotation] ‘we ... have been’, ‘has been’ here signify that they only were, and are not now, it is a synecdoche of the genus for the species.

6. Par excellence: by their excellence or on account of their eminence. This is commonly called antonomasia, as also when contrariwise, by synecdoche of the species, a proper name is used for a common.

¹²⁴ This final paragraph is headed in 1597 ‘Epilogus troporum’, where it forms chapter 13. In 1629 it is relegated to the end of the notes to chapter 11.

¹²⁵ ὀψοποιία καὶ κόμμωσις (opsopoia and kommosis), referring back to chapter 1 (and Gorgias, q.v.).

7. Tydides and Pelides. Patronymics are put in place of proper names: for Diomedes and Achilles were the most heroic of the sons, the former of Tydeus, the latter of Peleus. In the same way Atreus had two sons with Aerope, Agamemnon and Menelaus, but by 'Atrides' we understand Agamemnon, inasmuch as he was said to be the king of kings in the Trojan expedition; as Horace, Epistles I [2.11–12]:

... Nestor hurries between Pelides and Atrides to settle their quarrel.

8. & 9. The poet, the orator. For as among poets Homer, [B4r] of the Greeks, and Virgil, of the Romans stood out as chief, so among orators do Demosthenes among the former and Cicero among the latter.

10. Parent: for father. A catachresis: for, to give birth (parere), from which the word 'parent' comes, is a matter for women only: so that the metaphor (translatio) seems easy referring to a mother, but rather harsh for a father.

11. I promised. 'I promised' is here put catachrestically for 'I threatened', as the other way round in [chapter 9, above, on] synecdoche of the species [note 5].

12. Error. This is a tapinosis, lightening the atrocity of the thing. So we say that he 'touched' who dealt a blow, or 'damaged', when he wounded.

13. The consul bids the enemy leave the city. By these general words, 'consul', 'enemy', 'city', we are to understand Cicero, Catiline, Rome.

14. That one etc. Here there are metonymies: 'Senate' for the senators, 'Rome' for the Romans; synecdoche: 'roofs' (tecta) for buildings, 'city-walls' for the city; but those metaphors by which inanimate and brute things sentiently and actively 'come out', 'receive' and 'rejoice', garner especial praise.

Where the figure of a word is in the dimension¹²⁷ of a sound, the measure is either poetic, that is

1. Rhythm or

2. Metre;

or

3. Rhetorical.

Where the figure of a word is in the repetition of a sound, and the repetition is of the same sound, and comes immediately within the same sentence, it is

1. Epizeuxis, and in a different sentence, it is

2. Anadiplosis;

where it is repeated with interruption in the same place at the start of sentences, it is

3. Anaphora

and in the clausulae (at the end of sentences), it is

4. Epistrophe;

where in different places, at the start and end of the same sentence, it is ¹²⁷ dimensio: measuring; later it will be translated as ‘scansion’.

5. Epanalepsis and of different sentences,

6. Epanodos;

where the repetition is of slightly distinct sounds, of words of different origin, it is

7. Paronomasia and of words of the same origin,

8. Polypoton.

Where the figure is of the sentence, and is in logismus,¹²⁸ it is of two kinds: 1., exclamation, that is

1. Ecphonesis, or withdrawal (revocatio), by the correction of something that has gone before, that is

2. Epanorthosis, or by leaving unsaid something that is to follow, that is

3. Aposiopesis;

or 2., turning to another person, that is ¹²⁸ The figures in this second list are commonly called figures of thought; in the first list, figures of speech. On the difference see Gideon O. Burton, Sylva Rhetoricae: ‘Many rhetoricians have divided rhetorical figures into those of speech and those of thought [...]. Figures of speech pertain to verbal expression; figures of thought, to ideas. (The latter category overlaps generally, therefore with invention and its topics)’. He also notes that the distinction can be difficult to maintain. See also definitions in chapters 16 and 24 in this edition: ‘A figure of speech (dictio) is in the measure of its own sound’; ‘A figure of thought (sententia) [...] affects the whole sentence with some movement of the heart and mind (animus)’ [JR].]

4. Apostrophe, or the feigning of another person, that is

5. Prosopopoeia;

where the figure of a sentence is in dialogismus in questioning, in the form of deliberation with ourselves, it is

6. Aporia, and with others,

7. Anacoenosis;

and in the form of anticipating an objection (occupatio) it is

8. Prolepsis & prosapodosis; where the dialogismus is in answering, and licence is permitted for something done, it is

9. Epitrope

And for something said,

10. Synchoresis.

Chapter 12

An exposition having been given on tropes, the first genus of style, it follows that our discussion should be in the second place on the figure.

A figure¹²⁹ is elocution in which the habit (habitus)¹³⁰ of speech is changed in a correct and simple customary manner.

For as a trope is generally of single words, so a figure is of conjoined: and as one word is proper and the other modified, so one way of speaking is straightforward and the other is figured: the former the Greeks call ἀσχημάτιστον (askhēmatiston) [figureless], the latter ἐσχημντισμένην (eskhēmatismenēn) [figured].¹³¹

A figure is of speech [lit. a word, dictio], or of a sentence. A figure of a word is a figure in which the speech is ornamented by words fittingly and happily sounding among themselves. And it is in the dimension (dimensio)¹³² or repetition of sounds.

A figure in the dimension is that sweet measure¹³³ of sounds in speech:

to which one thing nothing is more closely akin to our minds: for we are aroused by number, and lulled, and are led to cheerfulness and sadness. And its grace comes not only from the measuring of syllables but also from the sounds of the letters, and especially of vowels, which sound loftier, or more completely combined, in delivery.

¹²⁹ In the margin, Σχῆμα (Schēma).

¹³⁰ habitus: the metaphor being from clothing.

¹³¹ Quintilian, IX.1.13.

¹³² 'dimension or measuring of sounds or words': Smith, Mysterie, B3r.

¹³³ numerus: later in the book used for rhythm in prose and metre in poetry.

Moreover this should always be striven for: that a running together of vowels¹³⁴ in different words should happen as rarely as possible.¹³⁵

¹³⁴ Or clash: concursum vocalium. The objection (in Quintilian) is not to elision in scansion of poetry but hiatus in oratory, caused by a word ending in a vowel and the next starting in a vowel, especially the same one.

¹³⁵ Cf. Quintilian, IX.4.33.

Chapter 13

Measure is poetic or rhetorical. The poetic is that which is always constrained by the laws of fixed quantities:

and is generally found in the mythical performances for the portrayal and representation of human characteristics, from whence tragedy, comedy and the other genres of poetry arose; in which περιπέτεια καὶ ἀναγνώρισις (peripeteia and anagnōrisis), the unforeseen reversal and recognition of fate at last [B5v] delighted men's minds; and for the same thing a particular freedom of any rhetorical ornament is accepted.

The poetic measure is the rhythm, or the metre.

RHYTHM is the poetic measure that is made up of a set number of syllables, irrespective of quantity; and very often it is combined with an epistrophe¹³⁶ of sound, as in that poem by our own Homer:¹³⁷

Deeds soone doe die, how euer nobly done,
And thoughts of men doe, as themselues, decay,
But wise words taught in numbers for to run,
Recorded by the Muses, liue for aye;
Ne may with storming showrs be washt away,

¹³⁶ A recurrence (Latin, reversio), i.e. rhyme.

¹³⁷ Edmund Spenser, 'The Ruines of Time', 400–406, 428–34, slightly altered from the printed editions. Foster Watson, The English Grammar Schools to 1600: Their Curriculum and Practice (Cambridge, 1908), points out (p. 442 and n.) that 'through eleven editions of this school-book written in Latin the attention of generations of schoolboys was called to these lines of Spenser, all the more emphatically for being surrounded by Latin on the technical terms of rhetoric. No one can leave the Rhetoric without noting that, when Butler suggests to readers that observation of the best writers will give the clearest idea as to the effects of rhythm obtained by the vivid disposition of sonorous and resonant syllables, he gives the names of English poets parallel with those of Latin writers. English literature was not taught in the schools of the first half of the 17th century, but Butler in his Rhetoric takes us very near to the suggestion of it. [n.] It is to the Rhetorics we must look for the origins of the Grammar school-teaching of English literature'. This may overstate the case, seeing as this is Butler's only quotation from English literature. Nevertheless, in publishing Talon's work for use in English schools, even though he did so in Latin, Butler did lay the foundations for the adaption of classical rhetorical teaching to the English language. For a translation of Talon with English examples see Fraunce, Arcadian Rhetorike (1588).

Ne bitter breathing winds with boyst'rous blast,
Nor age, nor enuie shall them ever waste.

And a little after:

For not to have beene dipt in Lethe lake,
Could save the sonne of Thetis from to die;
But that blinde Bard did him immortall make
With verses dipt in dew of Castalie:
Which made the Easterne Conquerour to crie,
O fortunate yong man! whose vertue found
So braue a Trumpe thy noble acts to sound.

This rhythm, the decasyllable, is especially renowned as a heroic metre.

The genera of rhythm can be differentiated partly in the number of their syllables, partly in the varying disposition of repeating sounds: but these things* will be taught best by close attention to the best poets.

* Such of our poets as are worthy of comparison to Homer, Virgil, Ovid, and the other ancients of better repute: as SIR PHILIP SYDNEY, EDMUND SPENSER, SAMUEL DANIEL, MICHAEL DRAYTON, JOSUAH SYLVESTER, GEORGE WITHER, and others flourishing in talent (ingenium) and skill, in whom our time is very rich; and in first place the master of them all, the single light of his obscure age: SIR GEOFFREY CHAUCER.

[B6r]

Chapter 14

METRE¹³⁸ is the poetic measure that is made up of a set number of feet: in which both a vowel and a final *m*¹³⁹ with its preceding vowel are elided* when the following word begins with a vowel, and the length of the final syllable is considered of no import. Horace, Epistles, Book I, 2 [54]:

Sincerum¹⁴⁰ est nisi vas, quodcumqe infundis acescit
(Unless the container is unblemished, whatever you pour in will go sour).

Here the ‘e’ in quodcumque and the ‘um’ in sincerum are elided; and the final ‘scit’, though it is short, is considered long. A diphthong here is accounted the same¹⁴¹ as a vowel, as Aeneid III [530]:

Crebrescunt optatae aurae, portusque patescit
(The hoped-for breezes pick up and the port lies open).

But heu (alas), o, ah, and io (exclamations) do not elide.

¹³⁸ The subject of this chapter is Latin prosody: the theory and practice of versification. Butler significantly extends Talon’s brief discussion, which he follows in 1597. Latin prosody differs from prosody in English and other modern languages in that its rhythms are ‘quantitative’ rather than ‘accentual’, and its syllables are understood as either long (ˉ) or short (˘) rather than as stressed or unstressed. The length of a syllable is determined by the ‘intrinsic quantity of the different vowel-and-consonant’ combinations: e.g. all diphthongs are long, but vowels can be either long or short. Butler lists the rules from B11v to D3r in this edition. On Latin prosody see D. S. Raven, Latin Metre: An Introduction (London: Faber and Faber, 1965), pp. 22-30, quotation at p. 22. On the teaching of Latin prosody in the Elizabethan grammar school, see D. Attridge, Well-weighed Syllables: Elizabethan Verse in Classical Metres (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1974): pp. 41-68. For an online guide to the rules of quantity, see here. [JR]

¹⁴⁰ The underlinings are mine, in the hope that it will help the reader who is unfamiliar with Latin navigate this section.

¹⁴¹ Reading ‘rationem’ for the misprinted ‘vationem’.

O however, sometimes loses a quantity¹⁴² on account of a following vowel: Eclogues II [65]

Te Corydon, o Alexi. Trahit sua quemque voluptas (Alexis, Corydon [hunts] you: each follows his desire).

See [the note immediately] below on omitted synaloephe.¹⁴³

* Elision of a vowel is called by the grammarians SYNALOEPE; that of a final m with its preceding vowel, ECTHLIPSIS. The poets disregarded both at will.

Synaloephe is omitted, Greek fashion, at Eclogues III [79]:

Et longum formose vale, vale^e, inquit, lola
(And long he said farewell, farewell, beautiful lollas).

Both Eclogues VIII [108]:

Credimus? an quiⁱ amant ipsi sibi somnia fingunt?
(Do I believe it? Or do those who are in love make their own dreams for themselves?),

Aeneid VI [507]:

Nomen et arma locum servant; te^e, amice, nequivi (Your name and arms watch over the place. You, my friend, I could not), and Aeneid VIII [72]:

¹⁴² i.e. is scanned short.

¹⁴³ 'The coalescence or contraction of two syllables into one; esp. the coalescence (in verse) of two vowels at the end of one word and the beginning of the next, by obscuration of the former (or, loosely, by suppression of it, in which case more properly called elision)' (OED) [JR].

Tuque, o Thybri, tu o genitor cum flumine sancto
(And you, O Tiber, you, O Father, with your holy river),

Catullus against Mamurra and Caesar [57.7]:

Uno in lectulo erudituli ambo¹⁴⁴
(Both a little experienced in one bed)

and Georgics IV [461]:

Implerunt montes[,] flerunt Rhodopei~~ae~~ arces (Filled the mountains, and the citadels of Rhodope wept') are where long vowels are not elided but lose half their quantity.

Sometimes, too, they keep their full length; Eclogues VII [53]:

Stant et iuniperi, et castane~~ae~~ hirsutae (Junipers stand there too, and the prickly chestnuts) and Eclogue VI [44]:

Clamassent, ut littus Hyla, Hyla, omne sonaret (They cried out, so that the whole shore echoed 'Hylas! Hylas!'):

here the 'a' in the first Hyla stays long, but in the second it is cut short. So Georgics I [281]:

Ter sunt conati imponere Pelio Ossam
(Thrice they tried to pile Pelion onto Ossa),

¹⁴⁴ Modern editions read 'Uno in lecticulo erudituli ambo', with three elisions. In Butler's version the 'o' of lectulo has to be read short, rather than elided.

[B6v] where the ‘i’ keeps its length but the ‘o’ is cut short.

Sometimes too a short vowel is kept unelided, as Lucretius [De Rerum Natura,] I [1078]:

Ponderis amissa vi possint stare inani;¹⁴⁵

(Losing the force of their weight they can come to a standstill in the void)

Aeneid I [405]:

Et vera incessu patuit dea: ille ubi matrem

(And showed herself truly a goddess by her gait: when he [recognised] his mother) and Metamorphosis V [625]:

Et bis ‘io Arethusa, io Arethusa!’ vocavit¹⁴⁶

(And twice called out ‘Io, Arethusa! Io Arethusa!’).

There are also cases where ecthlipsis is omitted, as in Ennius, quoted by Priscian,¹⁴⁷

Insignita fere tum millia militum octo

(Then near eight thousand soldiers, arrayed with banners).

There are examples of this kind in Lucretius, as Book I [436]:

Corporum augebit numerum, summamque sequetur;¹⁴⁸

(Will increase the number of bodies, and go to make up the sum);

¹⁴⁵ Modern editions tend to correct to ‘stare in inani’, supposing haplography in the MS tradition.

¹⁴⁶ Some modern editions transpose ‘vocavit’ to before the second ‘io Arethusa’ to avoid this.

¹⁴⁷ Priscian, Institutiones I (p. 30, vol. 2 Keil).

¹⁴⁸ But modern editions emend to ‘corporis’.

Book II [466]:

Nam quod fluvidum est, e levibus atque rotundis¹⁴⁹
(For because it is fluid, made of little and round things)

Book III [196]:

Namque papaverum aura potest suspensa levisque¹⁵⁰ (For a light and hovering breeze can [blow the seed] of poppies) and Book VI [276]:

Semina seque simul cum eo commiscuit igni
(And at the same time the seeds have mixed with that fire);

and these Ovid too dared to imitate [Heroides,] epistle 5 [85];

Digna sum et cupio fieri matrona potentis
(I am worthy and desire to be the wife of a powerful man)

as the original Aldine edition has it: although some corrector or other, overly worried that the metre was limping, unnecessarily decided to give it some help with the interjection of the conjunction que (and). For elsewhere the reading is: ‘Dignaque sum’ etc.¹⁵¹

The early Romans elided ‘s’ and its preceding vowel before a vowel, but only the ‘s’ before a consonant: as does Ennius, ¹⁴⁹ Modern editions emend to ‘fluvidus’.

¹⁵⁰ Again, modern editions read ‘papaveris’.

¹⁵¹ In fact, the reading is based on MS evidence, and not scholarly conjecture. Modern editions emend to ‘Dignaque sum et’, eliding ‘sum’. The Aldine edition of 1502 was reprinted for English readers by Shakespeare’s classmate Richard Field in 1594 (M.L. Stapleton, ‘Edmund Spenser, George Turberville and Isabella Whitney read Ovid’s “Heroides”’, Studies in Philology, 105:4 (Fall, 2008), p. 494 n.19) which was doubtless familiar to Butler.

Spernitur orator bonus, horridus miles amatur
(The good orator is scorned, the rough soldier adored)

Vicit Olympia, nunc senio confectus quiescit
(Who won the Olympics, now lives quiet, worn out in old age)

(Cicero quotes the latter in De Senectute [5.14], the former in Pro Murena [14.30]), and Lucretius frequently, as in Book I [186]:

Nam fierent iuvenes subito ex infantibus parvis
(For from being little infants they would suddenly become young men), and in the same book [453],

Pondus uti saxi calor ignibus liquor aquae¹⁵²
(As weight is a property of rocks, heat of fire, liquidness of water) and in the same book [II.263],

Nonne vides etiam patefactis tempore puncto (Do you not see too when they are opened at a point in time);

and Hostilius, Annales I:¹⁵³

Saepe greges pecuum ex hybernis pastibus pulsae (Often the herds of cattle driven from their winter pastures).

Catullus too says to Gellius [116.8]:

¹⁵² Modern editions read 'ignis' or 'ignist' with no elision, though the exact reading is still open to debate.

¹⁵³ Hostius [sic], Bellum Histricum I (fragment quoted by Priscian, Institutiones I, p. 270 vol. 2 Keil, from whom Butler has taken the apparently incorrect title).

Affixus nostris tu dabis supplicium¹⁵⁴

(You'll pay the price when you've been fastened), and Manilius, Book II [440]:

Formosos Phoebus Geminos, Cyllenius Cancrum¹⁵⁵

(Phoebus over the fair twins, Mercury over Cancer).

So Lucretius, Book II [?467]:

Est e laevibus et rotundis adnixa volare¹⁵⁶

(... is ..., [bodies] made of light and round things taking pains to fly) and Book IV [214]:

Nonne vides igitur quam puncto temporis imago¹⁵⁷

(Do you not see therefore how an image at a point in time), and even Virgil, Aeneid II [508]:

Limina tectorum et mediis in penetralibus hostem¹⁵⁸

(The thresholds of houses and the enemy in their inner midst) and Aeneid XII [709]:

¹⁵⁴ Modern editions read 'At fixus' (but ... pierced).

¹⁵⁵ Housman's edition reads 'Cyllenie' without noticing any other MS or editorial variant, though Butler is not the only early source to quote 'Cyllenius' here.

¹⁵⁶ This line, though quoted in the 17th century as an example of Lucretian ecthlipsis, appears to have been the result of a very garbled MS tradition.

¹⁵⁷ Modern editions read 'Iamne vides igitur quam puncto tempore imago', with elision of temporee.

¹⁵⁸ Modern editions read 'medium', with (normal) elision of the m.

Inter se coiisse viros et decernere ferro¹⁵⁹

(That men met between themselves and decided the outcome with the sword).

Sometimes there is a syllable over in a verse (which is then called a HYPERMETER) after the expected number of feet, ending in a vowel or 'm', which needs to be elided by the vowel beginning the next verse, as in Georgics II [69–70]:

[B7r]

Inseritur vero et foetu nucis arbutus horrida,

Et steriles platani ...

(But the rough strawberry-tree is grafted with the scion of a walnut-tree,

And the barren plane ...)

and Metamorphoses XII [395–6]:

Barba erat incipiens, barbae color aureus, aurea

Ex humeris medios ...

(His beard was beginning to grow, the colour of the beard was golden, golden [hair fell]

From his shoulders ...).

So Aeneid VII [160–61]:

Iamque iter emensi turris ac tecta Latinorum

Ardua cernebant ...

(And now, their journey over, they beheld the towers and high roofs of the Latini) and Metamorphoses XV [718–19]:

¹⁵⁹ Modern editions read 'cernere', with no need for elision.

Et tellus Circaea et spissi littoris Antium.

Huc ubi ...

(And the land of Circe, and Antium with its busy shores.

Here, when ...).

The enclitic conjunction -que (and) very often makes an extra syllable, as Georgics II [344–5]:

Si non tanta quies iret frigusque caloremque

Inter, ...

(If this great respite did not come between the frost and the heat of summer),

and in the same book [443–4]:

Navigiis pinus, domibus cedrosque¹⁶⁰ cupressosque;

Hinc radios ...

(Pines for ships, and cedars and cypresses for houses;

From these, spokes ...);

in Aeneid II:¹⁶¹

lactemur, doceas: ignari hominumque locorumque

Erramus, ...

(Explain to us [where] we are cast up: we are wandering with no knowledge of these people or places, ...);

in the same [I.448–9]:

¹⁶⁰ Modern editions read ‘cedrumque’.

¹⁶¹ A lapse of memory; in fact, I.332–3.

Aurea¹⁶² cui gradibus surgebant limina, nexae~~que~~ aere trabes, ...

(Its bronze thresholds at the top of steps, and beams with bronze joints);

and in the same again [Il.745–6]

Quem non incusavi amens hominumque deorum~~que~~,

Aut quid in eversa vide¹⁶³ crudelius urbe?

(Which of the gods, what man did I not blame in my madness, Or, behold, was anything more cruel in the city's overthrow?).

But these examples, partly archaic, partly used with licence by the poets, are rather to be noted than imitated.

And these¹⁶⁴ are near universal.

METAPLASMUS is rarer: that is, when something in a word is redundant, lacking, or altered. Something is made redundant or lacking either by addition or taking away, or by dividing or contraction.

There are six species of metaplasma by addition or taking away: prothesis,¹⁶⁵ aphaeresis, epenthesis, syncope, paragoge, and apocope. Of metaplasma by dividing or contraction, there are two: diaeresis and synaeresis.

PROTHESIS is the adding of a letter or syllable at the beginning of a word: as gnatus, tetuli.

¹⁶² Modern editions read 'Aerea'.

¹⁶³ Modern editions read 'vidi'.

¹⁶⁴ That is, synaloephe (see note 143) and ecthipsis (i.e. 'The omission or elision of letters or syllables (often the consonant "m" and the vowel that precedes it) for the sake of poetical meter', Sylva Rhetoricae). The argument picks up here from the first paragraph of the chapter. In 1629 (chapter 14), Butler defines synaloephe and ecthipsis as two species of metaplasma, specifying that this kind of metaplasma is 'fere perpetuum' (near universal), whereas the others (prothesis, etc, listed next) are rarer.

¹⁶⁵ Or prosthesis.

In place of natus and tuli.

APHAERESIS is the taking away from the beginning of a word: as ruit, temnere.

In place of eruit, contemnere.

EPENTHESIS is the adding to the middle of a word: as alituum, navita, induperator, littera.

In place of alitur, nauta, imperator, littera.¹⁶⁶

[B7v]

Aeneid VIII [27]:

Alituum pecudumque genus sopor altus habebat
(Deep sleep held the race of birds and beasts);

Juvenal, Satires IV [28–9]:

Quales tunc epulas ipsum glutisse putamus Induperatorem ...
(What sort of feasts do we think the emperor swallowed down then);

another at Lucretius I [82]:

Indugredi sceleris, quin contra saepius olim¹⁶⁷
(Setting foot on a [path] of sin; but on the contrary, often once)

¹⁶⁶ (g)natus, (te)tuli: born, I bore; (e)ruit, (con)temnere: he overthrew, to scorn; alit(u)um, navita, induperator, littera: of birds, sailor, emperor, letter.

¹⁶⁷ Modern editions read ‘quod contra saepius illa’

and the same, II [459]:

At non esse tamen perplexis indupedita

(But not however to be entangled with ones entwined round).

Thus quattuor,* Porsenna, quotidie, etc; for in certain words the poets are in the habit of doubling the consonant immediately following a syllable that is short by nature in order to lengthen it; especially after the prefix re-, as in relliquiae, relligio, relligiosus, repperi, reppuli, rettuli, rellatus, redduco etc.¹⁶⁸

* The ‘a’ of quattuor is shortened by nature, as is the ‘o’ of quotidie and the ‘e’ of Porsenna, as in Ennius:¹⁶⁹

Cedunt ter quatuor de caelo corpora sancta¹⁷⁰

(Thrice four sacred bodies [of birds] came from the sky).

And this is also found in quāter (four times) and quāterni (four each). But epenthesis is so prevalent here [in quattuor] that you will scarcely read it shortened anywhere.

SYNCOPE is the removal of something from the middle of a word: as (1.) vincla, (2.) virūm, (3.) petii, (4.) repostus.

For vincula (chains), virorum (of men), petivi (I sought); repositus (placed).

[notes to syncope]

1. So circlus (a), gubernaculum (b), maniplus (c), oraclum (d), periclum, s[a]eclum (e), for circulus, gubernaculum, manipulus, oraculum, periculum, s[a]eculum.¹⁷¹

¹⁶⁸ Quat(t)uor, four, Porsen(n)a, Lars, of Clusium, quot(t)idie, every day; rel(l)iquiae, remainder, relligio, religion, relligiosus, religious, repperi, I found, reppuli, I repelled, rettuli, I brought back, rellatus, brought back, redduco I lead back.

¹⁶⁹ This line and the next are printed in larger font in 1621 in error.

¹⁷⁰ Modern editions correct to ‘Cedunt de caelo ter quattuor corpora sancta’, a different spelling again. This line is printed in larger font in 1621 in error.

¹⁷¹ Circle; ship’s helm; handful or company; oracle; danger; age or century.

2. So deūm, divūm, superūm, magnanimūm (f), equūm (g), sociūm (h), Teucrūm, Danaūm, and the like; for deorum, divorum, etc; also currūm (i) for curruum.¹⁷² This shortened genitive is very frequent in the poets.

3. So lenibat (l), vestibat (m), polibant (n), nutribat (o), dixti, direxti (p), petiit, accestis, admorunt, gustaram, audieram, porgite (q), extinxem (r), vixet (s), iusso (t), explesse (v), for leniebat, vestiebat, poliebat, nutriebat, dixisti, direxisti, petivit, accessistis, admoverunt, gustaveram, audiveram, porrigite, extinxissem, vixisset, iussero, explevisse.¹⁷³

4. So compostus (x), expostus (y), impostus (z), suppostus (*), for compositus etc.,¹⁷⁴ with the vowel ‘i’ removed.

a) Georgics III [166]: At primum laxos tenui de vimine circlos

(But first loose circles of thin willow-wands)

b) Aeneid V [176]: Ipse gubernaclo rector subit, ipse magister (Himself steersman and master, he went to the helm)

c) Georgics I [400]: Immundi meminere sues iactare maniplos

(The dirty pigs [do not] remember to toss handfuls)

c) Aeneid IX:¹⁷⁵ Disiectique duces, desolatique manipuli

(Scattered leaders and abandoned companies)

d) Aeneid III [143]: Rursus ad oraclum Ortygiae Phoebumque remenso

(Retracing our journey again to the oracle of Delos, and Apollo)

¹⁷² Genitive plurals: of the gods, divinities, celestials, the great-hearted, horses, allies, Trojans, Greeks; of chariots.

¹⁷³ He was soothing, he was clothing, they were adorning, he would nourish, you said, you guided, he sought, you approached, they drew near, I had tasted, I had heard, hold out, I should have extinguished, he would have lived, I will have ordered, to have filled.

¹⁷⁴ Put together or settled; put out or exposed; put over or imposed; put under or substituted.

¹⁷⁵ In fact, XI.870.

- e) Eclogue IV [5]: Magnus ab integro s[a]eclorum nascitur ordo
(The great order of the ages is born anew)
- e) the same [46]: Talia s[a]ecla suis dixerunt currite fuis¹⁷⁶

- f) Georgics IV [476]: Magnanimum heroum, pueri innuptaeque puellae
(Of great-hearted heroes, boys and unwed girls)
- g) Georgics II [542]: Et iam tempus equum fumantia solvere colla
(And now the time is come to loose the horses' foaming necks)
- h) Aeneid V [174]: Oblitus decorisque sui sociumque salutis (Forgetful of his own dignity and his companions' safety)

[B8r]

- i) Aeneid VI [653–4]: ... quae gratia currum
Armorumque fuit vivis, quae cura nitentes
(The beauty of armoured chariots to them when they were alive, and the care [they took of] gleaming [horses])
- l) the same [468]: Lenibat dictis animum lacrimasque ciebat
(He was soothing her soul with his words and summoning up tears)
- m) Aeneid VIII [160]: Tum mihi prima genas vestibat flore iuventa, (At that time first youth was clothing my cheeks with its flower)

¹⁷⁶ Butler puts 'fatis', a slip of the pen or memory; the correct reading was established in his day.

- n) the same [436]: Certatim squammis serpentum auroque polibant
(They were competing to adorn it with serpents' scales of gold)
- o) Aeneid IX:¹⁷⁷ Nutribat teneris immulgens ubera labris
(He would nourish [his daughter] giving her tender lips to suck at the teats)
- So Catullus, Book I, Argonautia:¹⁷⁸
Vellera virgati custodibant calathisci (Little wicker baskets guarded the fleece);
- Propertius, Book III, on the avarice of girls:¹⁷⁹
Atque hinuli pellis totos operibat amantes
(And the skin of a fawn did the job of covering lovers all over)
- p) Aeneid VI [57]: Dardana qui Paridis direxti tela manusque (Who guided the Trojan weapons and hand of Paris)

(Bind your hair with a garland and hold out your cups in your right hands)
- r) Aeneid IV [606]: Cum genere extinxem, memet super ipsa dedissem (Should have extinguished [them] and their race, and given myself up as well)
- s) Aeneid XI [118]: Vixet cui vitam deus aut sua dextra dedisset
(He would have lived, to whom the god or his own right hand granted it)

¹⁷⁷ Again, in fact, XI.572.

¹⁷⁸ 64.319.

¹⁷⁹ III.13.35. The line has been subject to much emendation, and modern editions read (inter alia) 'hinnulei pellis stratos operibat amantes'.

- t) the same [467]: Cetera, qua iusso, mecum manus inferat arma
(Let the remaining force bring their weapons along with me, to where I order)
- v) Aeneid II [586]: ... animumque explesse iuvabit (and it will be pleasing to have filled my soul)
- x) Aeneid II:¹⁸⁰ Troia: nunc placida compostus pace quiescit (Trojan[armour]: now he rests, settled in the quiet of peace)
- y) Aeneid X [662]: Obvia ventorum furiis expostaque Ponto (Open to the raging of the winds and exposed to the sea)
- z) Aeneid IX [716]: Inarime Iovis imperiis imposita Typhoeo (Ischia, placed over Typhoeus by Jupiter's commands)
- *) Aeneid VI [24]: Hic crudelis amor tauri suppositaque furto (Here the savage love of a bull and [Pasiphae] placed under by trickery)

I omit examples of the rest as being very frequent.

PARAGOGÉ is addition at the end of a word, as dicier for dici (to be said).

APOCOPE is taking away at the end of a word, as dixtin', curru'.

For dixtine (did you say?), currui (dative of currus, chariot).

Aeneid III [540]: Sed tamen iidem olim curru succedere sueti
(And yet these same [horses] are sometimes accustomed to submit to the chariot)

¹⁸⁰ A misprint; in fact, I.249.

So aspectu, venatu for aspectui, venatui:

Aeneid VI [465]: Siste gradum, teque aspectu ne subtrahe nostro (Hold your step and do not depart from our sight)

Aeneid IX [605]: Venatu invigilant pueri, sylvasque fatigant
 (The boys do not sleep for hunting, and tire out the woods)

The dative of the fourth declension¹⁸¹ is often subjected in the poets to apocope, by which it can more easily be of use to the epic metre.

DIAERESIS is the division of one syllable into two: as (1.) pictai, (2.) aheneus, (3.) suētus.

For pictae (genitive feminine of pictus, painted or coloured), aeneus (bronze), suetus (accustomed).

[Notes to diaeresis]

1. It is a matter of habit in Lucretius to divide genitives of the first declension in this manner; Virgil does it in four places only.

Aeneid III [354]: Aulai medio libabant pocula Bacchi
 (In the midst of the hall they were pouring Bacchus' libations)

Aeneid VI [747]: Aetherium sensum atque aurai simplicis ignem
 (Ethereal intelligence and the fire of pure air)

Aeneid VII [464]: Exsultantque aestu latices furit intus aquai
 (The liquid leaps up with the heat, and [a steaming river] of water rages within)

Aeneid IX [26]: Dives equum, dives pictai vestis et auri
 (A wealth of horses, a wealth of coloured dress and gold)

¹⁸¹ E.g. currui, aspectui, venatui.

[B8v]

The reason for this diaeresis is that the diphthong for Latin-speakers is ‘ae’, but for the Greeks the same is ‘ai’. And so the former imitated the latter and dissolved this diphthong into ‘aī’, and made the pure vowel ‘a’ long.

2. Horace, Epistles, Book I, 1 [60]:

Si recte facies: hic murus aheneus esto
(If you do right: let this be a wall of bronze)

So Evohe for evoe.¹⁸²

Aeneid VII [389]:

Evohe Bacche fremens solum te virgine dignum
(Howling ‘Evohe Bacche! You alone are worthy of the girl’)

For in Greek it is εὐοῖ:¹⁸³ from which comes euoe.¹⁸⁴

[Horace,] Odes II, 19 [5]:

Evoe recenti mens trepidat metu
(Euhoe! My mind trembles with new fear)

So in Catullus’s poem [55.20] to Camerius:

¹⁸² A cry to Bacchus; more correctly euhoē. Butler follows early editions in assuming diaeresis and taking evohe as a trisyllable (scanned as a dactyl); whereas Virgil’s euhoē preserves the Greek dissyllable (scanned as a spondee).

¹⁸³ More correctly εὐοῖ. The spelling of evoe/euoe is also inconsistent.

¹⁸⁴ This line is printed in larger font in 1621, in error.

Verbosa gaudet Venus loquella
(Venus rejoices in wordy talking)

3. Horace, [Sermones,] Book I, satire 8:

Cum mihi non tantum furesque feraeque suetae
(Since to me not only the thieves and the usual wild animals) where a liquescent ‘u’ becomes a vowel; as also in the following:

Thebaid I [468]:

Imo agite et positis quae vox¹⁸⁵ inopinaque suäsit
(Come rather and set aside what an unexpected voice persuaded)

Virgil, De Laude Horti [5]:¹⁸⁶

Holus suäve, multiplex herbae genus
(Sweet vegetables and the manifold kinds of herb)

Lucan, Book II [51]:

Fundat ab extremo flavos Aquilone Suëvos
(Let it pour down fair-haired Suevi from the furthest north)

Metamorphoses VI [291]:

¹⁸⁵ Modern editions read ‘quas nox’.

¹⁸⁶ Ascribed to Asmenius, in Riese’s Anthologia Latina, no. 635.

Imposito fratri moribunda relanguit ore

(She fainted in death, fallen with her face upon her brother)

So *evoluisset, persoluenda*¹⁸⁷ for evolvisse, persolvenda:

Ovid, [Heroides,] epistle 12 [6]:

Debuerant fusos evoluisset meos

(They ought to have unravelled my spindle-threads)

Ovid, [Heroides,] epistle 6 [74]:

Nunc quoque te salvo persoluenda mihi

(Now too, [vows] for your safety for me to fulfil), where a consonantal ‘v’ is turned into a ‘u’; as also in the following:

Tibullus, Elegies 7 [2]:

Stamina non ulli dissoluenda deo

(Threads [of fate], not to be unravelled by any god)

Tibullus, Elegies I.10 [62]:

Sit satis ornatas dissoluisset comas¹⁸⁸

(Let it be enough to have undone her ornate hair)

Catullus [2.13], to the sparrow:

¹⁸⁷ In larger font in error.

¹⁸⁸ Modern editions read ‘Sit satis ornatus dissoluisse comae’.

Quod zonam soluit diu ligatam
(Which untied her belt, long done up).

SYNAERESIS is the contraction of two syllables to one: for example aurea, aureis, aureo as disyllables.¹⁸⁹

Aeneid I [698]:

Aurea composuit sponda mediamque locavit
(She has settled onto a golden couch and placed herself in the middle),

in the same book [726]:

Atria dependent lychni laquearibus aureis (... halls; lamps hang from golden ceilings), and Aeneid X [116]:

Hic finis fandi: solio tum Iuppiter aureo
(Here was an end to speaking: then Jupiter [rose] from his golden throne).

For 'ea':

Lucretius, II [693]:

Aut nulla inter se duo sint ex omnibus eadem¹⁹⁰
(Or that no two of all of them are the same between them)

Lucretius, IV [744]:

¹⁸⁹ The 'e' in each case would naturally be treated as a separate syllable, but with synaeresis is merged with the following vowel.

¹⁹⁰ Modern editions read 'isdem'.

Caetera de genere hoc eadem ratione creantur
(The others of this kind are created in the same manner)

Aeneid X [487]:

Una eademque via sanguisque¹⁹¹ animusque sequuntur
(Blood and spirit follow, in one and the same way)

Propertius, III [6.36]:

Hac eadem rursus¹⁹² Lygdame curre via (Run, Lygdamus, back the same way)

Aeneid VII [190]:

Aureea percussum virga versumque venenis
(Struck by a golden wand and turned by poisons)

Horace, Sermones, Book II, satire 2 [21]:

Sudando pinguem vitiis albumque nec ostrea
(... by sweating; neither an oyster [can please] a man fat and pale through his own faults)

Eclogues VI [40]:

Nec tantum Rhodope miratur et Ismarus Orphea
(Nor are Rhodope and Ismarus so amazed at Orpheus)

¹⁹¹ Modern editions dispense with this 'que'.

¹⁹² Butler's text reads 'rarsus'; a misprint.

Georgics IV [34]:

Seu lento fuerint alve~~ea~~ria vimine texta
(Or whether the beehives are woven of pliable twigs)

Aeneid VI [300]:

Canicies inculta iacet, stant lumina flamme~~ea~~¹⁹³
(Unkempt his white hair lies, his eyes stare fixed and fiery)

For 'ei':

Aeneid I [41]:

Unius ob noxam et furias Aiakis Oile~~i~~
(On account of the offence and madness of one man, Ajax son of Oileus)

in the same [120]:

Iam validam Ilione~~i~~ navem, iam fortis Achatae
(Now Iloneus' strong ship, now brave Achates')

Aeneid VI [280]:

Ferre~~i~~que Eumenidum thalami, et discordia demens
(And the Furies' iron bedchamber, and insane strife)

[B9r]

¹⁹³ Modern editions read 'flamma'.

in the same:¹⁹⁴

Centum aere*ei* claudunt vectes, aeternaue ferri
(A hundred bronze bars keep them shut, and the enduring [strength] of iron)

Catullus [82.3], to Quintius:

Eripere ei noli quod multo charius illi
(Do not steal from him what is much more dear to him)

Metamorphoses XI [65]:

Nunc praecedentem sequitur, nunc praeuius ante*it* (Now he follows her, going in front; now he leads and goes in front)

Aeneid XII [84]:

Qui candore nives ante*irent*, cursibus aequor¹⁹⁵
(Who outdo the snows in their whiteness and the sea in speed)

For ‘eo’:

Lucretius, VI [961]:

Atque eodem pacto rebus sint omnibus apta
(And [not] equally fitted for all things)

Eclogues, VIII [81]:

¹⁹⁴ In fact, VII.609.

¹⁹⁵ Modern editions read ‘auras’ (the winds).

Uno eodemque igni, sic nostro Daphnis amore
(With one and the same flame, so may Daphnis with our love)

Aeneid VIII [292]:

Rege sub Euristheeo fatis Iunonis iniquae
(Under king Eurystheus and the fate dealt out by unjust Juno)

Aeneid IX [32]:

Cum refluit campis et iam se condidit alveeo
(When it flows back over the fields and then sets itself back in its channel)

Georgics, IV [270]:

Cecropiumque thymum et graveeolentia centaurea¹⁹⁶
(Thyme of Attica and heavy-perfumed centaury)

Lucretius, II [230]:

Nam per aquas quaecumque cadunt, atque aera deorsum¹⁹⁷
(For whatever fall downwards through the waters and air)

Lucretius, III [564]:

Displicere ipse oculus rem seorsum corpore toto
(The eye, separated from the whole body, [can] look at [no]thing)

¹⁹⁶ The final -ea of 'centaurea', itself scanned as a monosyllable by synaeresis, is hypermetrically elided with the initial 'Est' of the following line.

¹⁹⁷ Modern editions read 'rarum' (thin).

For 'ia':

Lucretius, II [719]:

Legibus his, quaedam ratio res terminat omnia¹⁹⁸

(By these laws, a certain reason defines things in all respects)

Aeneid VI [33]:

Bis patriae cecidere manus quin protinus omnia

(Twice the father's hands fell, and indeed all continuously)

Aeneid VII [237]:

Praeferimus manibus vittas ac verba precantia

(We offer sacrificial bands and words of prayer)

And so abiete, tenuia as trisyllables:

Aeneid II [16]:

Aedificant, sectaque intexunt abiete costas

(They build, and interlace ribs of cut fir)

Georgics II [121]:

Velleraque ut foliis depectant tenuia Seres

(And how the Chinese comb off slender flocks of silk from leaves)

¹⁹⁸ But modern editions read 'omnis' (defines all things).

where the vowels i and u are turned into consonants, as also in the following:

Martial, Book V, epigram 11 [1]:

Sardonychas, smaragdus, adamantas, iaspidas uno
(Sardonyxes, emeralds, diamonds, jaspers together)

Aeneid II [442]:

Haerent parietibus scalae; postesque sub Ipsos
(The ladders cling to the walls; and beneath the very doorposts)

in the same [492]:

Custodes sufferre valent, labat ariete crebro
(The guards are [not] strong enough to bear it, the [door] collapses under repeated blows of fir-wood)

Aeneid XI [890]:

Arietat in portas et duros obice postes
(Batters at the gates and the hard posts that guard the way)

Likewise Georgics I [482]:

Fluviorum rex Eridanus, camposque per omnes
(Eridanus king of rivers, and through all the fields)

Lucretius, II [232]:

Propterea quia corpus aquae naturaque tenuis
(For this reason, because the body of water and the thin nature [of air])

Georgics II [180]:

Tenuuis ubi argilla, et dumosis calculus Arvis
(Where there is thin white clay and gravel in the thorny fields)

Aeneid XII [905]:

Genua labant, gelido concrevit frigore sanguis¹⁹⁹
(His knees give way, and his blood has curdled in the icy cold)

I should, by the by, wish the reader to be advised that this synaeresis is not made by careless people putting, against the rules of this metre, in place of a dactylic foot, in some places a proceleusmatic or double pyrrhic,²⁰⁰ in others an anapaest: and if these examples in Lucretius,

Book II [232]:

Propterea quia corpus aquae naturaue tenuuis
(For this reason, because the body of water and the thin nature [of air])

Book IV [85]:

Mittunt, effigies quoque debent mittere tenuues (... send out, and must also send out their light appearances), and the like had occurred by chance, there is no doubt we would understand them to be a trochee²⁰¹ or anapaest put for a spondee.

In Lucretius, by synaeresis, a u vowel becomes liquescent, as by diaeresis a liquescent u becomes a vowel:

¹⁹⁹ Modern editions read 'gelidus'.

²⁰⁰ Four short syllables.

²⁰¹ Butler uses 'trochee' to mean three short syllables; see his definition below.

Book I [1061]:

Et simili ratione animalia suapte²⁰² vagari
(And for their own like reason animals rove)

Book II [661]:

Lanigerae pecudes, et equorum duellica proles
(Wool-bearing flocks and the warlike race of horses)

[B9v]

and in Lactantius, De Ave Phoenice [28]:

Duodecies undis irrigat omne nemus
(Twelve times a year waters the whole grove with its floods)

Certain examples are written with a contraction, as cogo, tibicen, nil, mi, obit, prendo, bigae, quadrigae, formed from coago, tibiicen, nihil, mihi, obiit (for obivit by syncope), prehendo, biugae, quadriugae.²⁰³

Some, though written out in full, are nevertheless generally contracted in the dimension (dimensio, i.e. scansion) of the metre: as, huic, cui, dii, ii,²⁰⁴ and the compounds* proin, dein, dehinc, deest, semianimis, anteambulo.^{205†}

* To wit, in which the contracted vowel is in some cases the first of the two, in others the second.²⁰⁶

²⁰² Modern editions read 'suppa' (head down).

²⁰³ I force, a piper, nothing, to me, s/he died, I grasp, a team of two animals, a team of four.

²⁰⁴ To this, to whom, the gods, those.

²⁰⁵ Hence, then, henceforth, is lacking, half-dead, I walk before.

²⁰⁶ Lit. 'in which, to be sure, the contracted vowel, in one case is of the former part, in another of the latter'. This appears to be the meaning; the phrase seems to have been expunged from 1629.

† So cuivis and the other compounds of cui, diis, iis, iidem, iisdem, proinde, deinde, deinceps, deeram, deesse, etc., semihomo, graveolens, anteactus, anteit, and the like.²⁰⁷

Also reiicio (I throw back) and eiicio (I throw out) are sometimes contracted, as:

Eclogues III [96]:

Tityre, pascentes a flumine reiice capellas
(Tityrus, drive your grazing goats back from the river)

Thebaid IV [574]:

Tela manu, reiicitque canes in vulnus hiantes
(Weapon in hand, he drives back the dogs baying for his blood)

Lucretius, IV [1272]:

Eiicit enim sulci²⁰⁸ recta regione viaque
(Throws off from the furrow's proper place and path)

Scan these reice, reicit, eicit; for the consonantal i is discarded by syncope (which also happens with other compounds of iacio, as:

[Ovid,] Ex Ponto, Book II, epistle 3 [37]:

Turpe putas abici quia sit miserandus amicus²⁰⁹
(You think it shameful to cast [a friend] off, since a friend ought to be pitied)

²⁰⁷ To whomever, to the gods, to them, to the same, hence, then, successively, I was lacking, to be lacking, half-human, heavy scented, driven before, s/he goes before.

²⁰⁸ Modern editions read 'sulcum' (throws off the furrow).

²⁰⁹ Modern editions read 'Turpe putas abigi, quia sit miserandus, amicum' (You think it shameful to drive away a friend since he ought to be pitied).

Martial, Book IV, epigram 54 [9]:

Nil adicit penso Lachesis fusosque sororum
(Lachesis adds nothing to her spinning, and her sister's spindles [she unwinds])

Lucan, Book VII:²¹⁰

Cur obicis magno tumulum, manesque uagantes
(Why do you throw a tomb over [Pompey] the great, and [shut in] his wandering spirit?)

Lucan, Book VII [574]:

Ipse manu subicit gladios, ac tela ministrat
(He supplies the swords himself and sees to the weapons)),²¹¹ and the e and i²¹² are contracted into ei.

Of metaplasmus by alteration the five species are tmesis, metathesis, antithesis, diastole and systole.

TMESIS is the figure which divides the parts of a compound word by the interposition of another word, as qui te cunque, inque salutatus:

Aeneid XII [61]:

Qui te cunque manent isto certamine casus
(Whatever is the fate that awaits you in this contest)

²¹⁰ In fact, VIII.796.

²¹¹ The closing parenthesis is missing in the printed text; supplied from the 1629 edition.

²¹² Referring to 'reice', 'reicit', 'eiicit' in the examples before the parenthesis, where the consonantal i is ignored and the ensuing 'ei' vowel is scanned as a single long syllable.

for quicunque te;

Aeneid IX [287–8]:

Hanc ego nunc ignaram huius quodcumque pericli est
inque salutatam linquo

(I leave her now ignorant of whatever the danger is, and without a farewell) for insalutatamque. Likewise:

Aeneid X [794]:

Ille pedem referens et inutilis, inque ligatus (He was retreating, helpless and encumbered) for illigatusque;

Aeneid I [610]:

Quae me cunque vocant terrae
(Whatever lands call me)

Aeneid XI [762]:

Qua se cunque furens medio tulit agmine virgo
(Wherever the raging maiden took herself in the midst of the army)

[B10r]

Aeneid XII [203]:

Quo res cumque cadent
(However things fall out)

Lucretius, Book I [873]:

Praeterea tellus, quae corpora cunque alit, auget
(Moreover the earth, which nourishes all bodies, increases)

The same, Book V [289]:

Terraque inumbratur qua nimbi cunque feruntur
(And the earth is shadowed wherever the clouds are borne)

The same, Book VI [19]:

Quae collata foris, et commodata cunque venirent
(Which had been brought from abroad and whatever profitable things had come)

Also:

Eclogues VI [6]:

Nunc ego namque super tibi erunt qui dicere laudes (Now I (for there will be others to sing your praises)) for supererunt;

Georgics III [381]:

Talis Hyperboreo septem subiecta trioni
(Such is the [race] living beneath the furthest northern sky) for septentrioni;

Aeneid I [412]:

Et multo nebulae circum dea fudit amictu
(And the goddess spread around him a thick cloak of mist)

for circumfudit;

Aeneid V [603]:

Hac celebrata tenus sancto certamina patri
(Thus far the contests for the sacred father) for hactenus;

In the same book:²¹³

Eripuit nobis medioque sub aequore mersit²¹⁴
(Snatched you from us and drowned you in the middle of the sea) for submersit;

Aeneid IX [339]:

Impastus seu²¹⁵ plena leo per ovilia turbans
(Or a hungry lion throwing the sheepfolds into chaos)

²¹³ In fact, Aeneid VI.342.

²¹⁴ Misprinted as 'mersie'.

²¹⁵ Modern editions read 'ceu' (like).

for perturbans;

Aeneid X [399–400]:

Tum Pallas biiugis fugientem Rhoetea praeter traicit

(Then Pallas struck through Rhoeteus as he fled past in his chariot) for praeterfugientem.

METATHESIS is the figure which puts one letter in another position: pistris, Tymbre, for pristis, Tymber.

1. The saw-fish, πρίστης (pristēs) in Aristotle, Historia animalium, Book VI, chapter 12,²¹⁶ is a sea creature of the cetacean family: with this meaning it is read pistris in the poet, in Aeneid III [426–7] where he speaks of Scylla:

Prima hominis facies et pulchro²¹⁷ pectore virgo

Pube tenus: postrema immani corpore pristis²¹⁸

(Above, she had the appearance of a human, and a maiden with a fair breast, as far as her groin: below, she was a saw-fish of hideous body) and Aeneid X [211], of Triton:

Frons hominem praefert, in pristin desinit alvus

(The front displayed a man, his stomach ending in a saw-fish).

²¹⁶ 566b3, spelt πρίστις, and sometimes misspelt πρῆστις (prēstis).

²¹⁷ Butler reads ‘pulchra’ (a maiden by her breast, as far as her fair groin?)

²¹⁸ Modern editions read ‘pistrix’ (with metathesis).

Mnestheus' ship in Aeneid V was assigned the name of this fish, while Sergestus' was the Centaur, Gyas' the Chimaera and Cloanthus' the Scylla [154–5]:

... post hos aequo discrimine Pristis
Centaurusque locum tendunt superare priorem
(... after these the Saw-fish and Centaur, at an equal distance, strive to gain a place in front) and shortly afterwards, alluding to the origin of the name (for it is said to be from πρίειν (priein) which is to saw), the poet says [218]:

Sic Mnestheus, sic ipsa fuga secat aequora Pristis²¹⁹
(So Mnestheus, so Pristis herself cuts through the waters in flight).

From this it is clear enough that it should in both cases be correctly written Pristis; but some put instead of this word Pistris, by metathesis.

2. Tymbre is at Aeneid X [394]:

Nam tibi Tymbre caput Evandrius abstulit ensis
(For Evander's sword took off your head, Tymber) and it is put by metathesis for Tymber, since correctly [B10v] he is Tymber not Tymbrus, as we read in the same book [391]:

Daucia, Laride Thymberque simillima proles
(You sons of Daucus, Laridus and Tymber, most alike).

ANTITHESIS is the figure which puts one letter in place of another, as olli, vostrum, for illi (they), vestrum (your).

²¹⁹ Butler here either simplifies or misremembers the quotation, which is '... secat ultima Pristis/aequora'.

DIASTOLE is the figure which lengthens a short syllable:²²⁰

Aeneid III [464]:

Dona dehinc auro graviā sectoque elephanto²²¹

(From there [he ordered] heavy gifts of gold and carved ivory)

Heroides 21:²²²

Molle meum levibus cōr est violabile telis²²³

(My soft heart is vulnerable to light weapons);

likewise Manilius, V [542]:

Incubuit Pontus, timuit naufrāgia tellus²²⁴

(Pontus lay [over the whole land], the earth feared shipwrecks) whom [Baptista] Mantuanus²²⁵ followed in the sixth of his Fasti:

Perdidit et fracto passa est naufrāgia²²⁶ clavo

(Lost [its magnet and pole star] and with helm broken, suffered shipwreck)

²²⁰ The layout in terms of text size and hierarchy is not consistent in the following section and has been regularised.

²²¹ In his edition of the Aeneid, R.D. Williams (2 vols, London and New York, 1972) accepts ‘with some uncertainty Shaper’s emendation of Dona dehinc auro gravia ac secto elephanto’, observing that the lengthening (diastole) of a short syllable before the caesura is paralleled in Ennius, and that Butler’s reading is that of all MSS and also of Servius (see his commentary ad loc.)

²²² In fact, 15.79.

²²³ Modern editions read ‘levibusque’ to avoid the problem.

²²⁴ Modern editions read ‘fluitavit naufraga tellus’ (the shipwrecked earth was afloat).

²²⁵ Italian humanist poet, 1447 – 1516.

²²⁶ The macron is misplaced by the typesetter.

and the same Mantuanus, in [Adulescentia,] eclogue 6 [57]:

Cum muliēre marem sociali foedere iungens
(When joining man with woman in social bond), for it is clear enough from Terence that the penultimate syllable in muliere should correctly be short, as in Andria, Act I, scene 1 [117]:

Effertur: imus, interea inter muliēres
(She is brought out: we go, and meanwhile among the women) and scene 4 [230]:

Nec satis digna cui committas primo partu muliērem (Nor is she satisfactory enough to entrust a woman to her for her first birth) and [Plautus,] Truculentus, Act II [scene 4, 434]:

Pro di immortales, non amantis muliēris
(Ye immortal gods, [it is] not for a woman in love) and elsewhere, passim; and equally in Martial, Book I, epigram 97 [7]:²²⁷

Amethystinasque muliērum vocat vestes
(And calls amethyst-coloured coats women's wear).

For another example [of diastole], Lucretius, V [280]:

Rēcidere assiduo quoniam fluere omnia constat
(To return, for it is the case that all things are in constant flux)

²²⁷ More modern editions number 96.7.

and Metamorphoses X [18]:

In quem rēcidimus²²⁸ quicquid mortale creamur
(Into which everything, all of us who are created mortal, descend)

Diastole is often found in the final syllable of a word [B11r] that begins the second, third, fourth or fifth foot of an epic verse, as:

Aeneid IV [64]:

Pectoribūs inhians spirantia consulit exta
(Open-mouthed she consulted the breathing entrails in the breasts)

Aeneid II [369]:

Luctus ubique, pavōr, et plurima mortis imago
(Everywhere fighting, fear and multiple sights of death)

Aeneid V [521]:

Ostentans artemque paritēr²²⁹ arcumque sonantem
(Equally showing skill and the sound of his bow)

Aeneid VII [398]:

Sustinet, ac natae Turnique canīt Hymenaeos
(She holds up [a pine branch] and sings the wedding hymn of Turnus and her daughter)

Aeneid III [91]:

²²⁸ Modern editions read 'reccidimus', a better spelling of the perfect tense.

²²⁹ Modern editions follow Heyne in reading 'pater' (veteran), also with a lengthened second syllable.

Liminaquē laurusque dei totusque moveri

(The threshold and the god's laurels, and the whole [mountain] moved)

Que is in fact rather often lengthened before a word beginning with two consonants, but there I would say the reason is rather position:²³⁰ see the first general rule for all syllables [below].

SYSTOLE is the figure which shortens a long syllable: as

Eclogues IV [61]:

Matri longa decem tulerunt fastidia menses

(Ten months have brought a long labour for your mother).

So Lucretius, III [1028]:

Occiderunt magnis qui gentibus imperitarunt

(They have died who ruled great nations)

Georgics III [283]:

Miscueruntque herbas et non innoxia verba

(They mixed herbs and harmful words)

Aeneid II [774]:

Obstipui, steteruntque comae, et vox faucibus haesit

(I was stunned, my hair stood on end and my voice caught in my throat)

Ibis [229]:

²³⁰ In the technical sense of positio by which a short vowel placed before two consonants becomes long (Quintilian, I.5.28 etc.; Servius, De Finalibus 450.1).

Gutturaque imbuērunt infantia lacte canino
(And wetted his infant throat with a bitch's milk)

[Ovid,] Remedia Amoris, Book I [263]:

Quid tibi profuērunt, Circe, Perseides herbae
(What use to you, Circe were the magic herbs of Hecate)

Sermones I, satire 10 [45]:

Vergilio annuērunt gaudentes rure Camenae
(The muses joyfully approved Virgil's countryside);

Also: [Horace,] Ars Poetica [65]:

Regis opus sterilisque diu palūs aptaque remis
(The work of a king; and the pool, long infertile and fit for rowing)

Heroides 10 [12]:

Thesea prensuras semisöpita²³¹ manus
(Half-asleep, [I moved] my hand to take hold of Theseus)

[Horace,]²³² Epistles I.13 [19]:

Vade, vale, cavē ne titubes mandataque frangas
(Come, prosper, take care not to stumble and break what is entrusted to you)

²³¹ Modern editions generally follow Heinsius in reading 'semisupina', avoiding the problem.

²³² Butler oddly writes 'the same', which should mean Ovid.

Tristia, Book I, elegy 1 [25]:

Tu cavē defendas, quamvis mordebere dictis (Take care not to defend me however much you are stung by words) unless you prefer this to be the archaic imperative cavo, but elsewhere it is long, as:

in the same poem [87]:

Ergo cavē liber et timida circumspice mente
(So take care, my book, and look about you with fearful mind)

Ex Ponto, Book III, elegy 1 [139]:

Si quid aget maius, differ tua coepta, cavēque
(If something greater is afoot, put off what you have started, and take care)

In smaragdōs, above,²³³ the position is shortened.

[B11v]

The foot²³⁴ is the dimension defined by set quantities of syllables.

*On the quantity of syllables*²³⁵

²³³ Martial, V.11.1; Martial deploys a short syllable here in spite of the ensuing two consonants.

²³⁴ The argument here picks up from the very beginning of chapter 14.

²³⁵ This excursus on the quantity of syllables lasts as far as D3r, line 6.

Quantity is that by which a syllable is said to be short, or long, or common [communis].²³⁶

A short syllable is of one measure of time [i.e. one beat]: and if there is need, it is denoted by this mark ˘ over the vowel.

A long syllable is of two measures: and if there is need, it is denoted by this mark ¯ over the vowel.

A common syllable is sometimes short, sometimes long.

The quantity is recognisable by rules, or examples.

The rules are general, or specific.

THE THREE GENERAL RULES FOR SYLLABLES

Position

First Rule

I. A vowel coming before two consonants, of which one at least is in the same word as the vowel, is lengthened, as Metamorphoses VII [309]:

Mōx ubi pōllicita ēst quo sīt fiducia māior

(As soon as she had promised, ‘So that you may have greater trust’ [she said])

Here, besides the syllables poll, est and sit, mox and ma are also lengthened by position, for a double [consonant] has the value of two consonants, and consonantal i is taken to be a double; but see the second specific rule, concerning a middle syllable.

²³⁶ i.e. can be taken as either short or long; also known as anceps, two-headed, in other words ‘either–or’.

¶ A short vowel at the end of a word, coming before two consonants, is also sometimes lengthened, as:

[B12r]

Lucretius, IV [515]:

Et libella aliqua si ex partē claudicat hilum
(And if a plumb-line wavers a little to one side)

Juvenal, Satires VIII [107]:

Occultā spolia, et plures de pace triumphos
(Hidden plunder and the many spoils of peace)

Tristia, Book V.15:²³⁷

Nil opus est mortē pro me, sed amore, fideque
(I have no use for your death, but love and loyalty)

Ex Ponto, Book I.8:²³⁸

Officii causā pluribus esse dati
(To give reason for service rendered by more things [done by you])

Catullus, Argonautica:²³⁹

Nulla fugae ratio, nullā spes, omnia muta

²³⁷ V.14.41; modern editions read 'Morte nihil opus est'.

²³⁸ Now numbered I.VII.66.

²³⁹ 64.186.

(No way of flight, no hope; everything silent)

Tibullus, Book I, elegy 5 [28]:

Pro segetē spicas, pro grege ferre dapem

(To offer wheat ears [as a sacrifice] for the harvest, a banquet for the flock), and the enclitic conjunction -que very often, as:

Eclogues IV [51]:

Terrasqueē, tractusque maris, caelumque profundum

(The lands, and the stretches of the sea, and the depths of heaven)

Georgics I [153]:

Lappaequeē tribulique interque nitentia culta

(The burs and caltrops and between the gleaming plantations)

in the same [164]:

Tribulaqueē traheaeque et iniquo pondere ratri

(Threshing-sledges and drags and rakes with harsh weight)

Aeneid X:²⁴⁰

Brontesqueē, Steropesque, et nudus membra Pyrachmon

(Brontes and Steropes and naked-limbed Pyragmon)

²⁴⁰ In fact, VIII.425.

Metamorphoses XIII [258]:

Alcandrumque, Haliumque, Noemonaquē, Prytaninque
([I slew] Alcander, Halius, Noemon and Prytanis).

And this is after the manner of the Greeks, who customarily lengthen a short vowel before two consonants, both at the end of a word and elsewhere, as:

Iliad I [38]:

Κίλλαν τε Ζαθέην Τενέδοιό τε Ἴφι ἀνάσσεις²⁴¹
Killan te zdatheēn Tenedoio te iphi anasseis
(And holy Killa, and rule by might over Tenedos)

in the same [49]:

δεινὴ δὲ κλαγγὴ γένετ' ἀργυρέοιο βιοῖο
deinē de klangē genet' argureoio bioio (terrible was the silver bow's twang)

in the same [106]:

μάντι κακῶν οὐ πῶ ποτέ μοι τὸ κρήγυον εἶπας
manti kakōn ou pō pote moi to krēguon eipas (Prophet of ills, you have never spoken anything agreeable to me)

in the same [234]:

²⁴¹ Butler's printed version is slightly inaccurate.

ναὶ μὰ τόδε σκῆπτρον, τὸ μὲν οὐ ποτε φύλλα καὶ ὄζους nai ma tode skēptron, to men ou pote phulla kai ozdous (by this staff, that never leaves and shoots).

Exception

A vowel that is naturally short, coming before a mute²⁴² and a liquid l or r in the same word, is common: as patris, volucris, Atlas, locuples,²⁴³

Except in compounds where the first word ends in a mute and the second starts with a liquid: for in that case, even though the words be separate, position applies, as ābluo, ōbruo.²⁴⁴

¶ Also a liquid n after certain consonants in Greek words, and m anywhere, makes a preceding short [B12V] vowel either short or long, as Metamorphoses VI [468]:

Ad mandata Prōgnes²⁴⁵ et agit sua vota sub illis
(At Procne's bidding, and carried out his own wishes under her command)

Petronius Arbiter (whom Quintilian and Macrobius cite) also treats this vowel as short:

atque urbana Prōgne, quae circum gramina fusa
(and courteous Procne, who surrounded with grass)

In [Horace,] Odes IV.3 [19–20]

²⁴² b, d, g (voiced) and p, t, c (unvoiced); also ph, th, ch.

²⁴³ Of a father, winged (genitive singular), Atlas, wealthy.

²⁴⁴ I wash away, I overthrow.

²⁴⁵ Or Prōcnes; modern editions also read 'sub illa'.

O mutis quoque piscibus
Donatura Cycni, si libeat, sonum
(O you who, if you wished, could give the sound of a swan to the silent fishes)

the metre is glyconic alternated with asclepiadean.²⁴⁶

Ausonius, Epistles 20:²⁴⁷

Quid refert? Cornix non ideo ante cycnum
(What does that matter? A crow is not therefore above a swan)

Martial, IX, epigram 106:²⁴⁸

Quae capta est alio nupta Lacaena Cycno
(What Spartan woman caught and bedded by another swan)

Metamorphoses XIII [430]:

Bistoniis habitata viris: Polymnestoris illic
(Inhabited by Thracian men: there Polymnestor's [realm])

In the same book [551]:

Vadit ad artificem dirae Polymnestora caedis
(She makes her way to Polymnestor who contrived the dreadful murder)

²⁴⁶ — — — — — x / — — — — — — — — — — x; the point here being that the y of 'cycni' is scanned short.

²⁴⁷ Numbered in the 1919 Loeb edition of Ausonius as XVIII.24.8. In this and the ensuing three examples the y is scanned short (though modern editions drop the n from Polymnestor).

²⁴⁸ IX.103.2; modern editions read 'nuda'. Again the y of cycno is short.

Silius Italicus, VIII [412]:

Ecce inter primos Therămnaeo a sanguine Clausi
(See, among the first, sprung from the Sabine blood of Clausus)

Martial, Book VII, epigram 86:²⁴⁹

Delectat Marium si perniciosus Ichneumon²⁵⁰
(If the baleful Egyptian mongoose delights Marius)

[Horace,] Odes II.4 [5–6]:

Movit Aiacem Telamone natum
Forma captivæ dominum Těcmessae
(The beauty of the captive Tecmessa moved her master Ajax, son of Telamon)

Diphthong

Second Rule

II. Every diphthong is long, as: hēi, nēuter, āulaea.²⁵¹

Likewise Maia, Coeus, etc.

However Maeotis (Tristia III.12 [2]) is shortened on account of the immediately following vowel:

²⁴⁹ VII.87.5.

²⁵⁰ Delectat is scanned long; Ich- is short.

²⁵¹ Alas, neither, drapery.

Longior antiquis visa Maeotis hiems
(A winter on the Black Sea that seemed longer than of old) when it is lengthened elsewhere, as:

Ex Ponto III.2 [59]:

Regna Thoas habuit Maeotide clarus in ora
(Famous Thoas had his realm on the shores of Maeotis)

Lucan, III [277]:

Quaque fretum torrens Maeotidis egerit undas
(And where the boiling strait drives the waters of Maeotis).

A diphthong at the end of a word is sometimes shortened when it is followed by a vowel: see [above] on omitted synaloephe.

The preposition prae ('before') is always short in compounds [C1r] when followed by a vowel, but regarding that see the first specific rule on the first syllable [below].

Synaeresis

Third General Rule for All Syllables

III. Synaeresis or crasis lengthens a syllable, as nīl, cōgo, obīt, deero.²⁵²

Juvenal, Satires VI [559]:

²⁵² For nihil (nothing), coago (I compel), obiit (he died), deero (I will lack); in the latter 'ee' is contracted as a single (long) syllable.

Magnus civis obit et formidatus Othoni
(The great citizen died, the one Otho feared).

So Aeneid IX [418]:

Dum trepidant [it]²⁵³ hasta Tago per tempus utrumque
(While they trembled, the spear went through both Tagus' temples)

Ovid,²⁵⁴ Consolatio ad Liviam [238]:

Author obit operis sed tamen extat opus
(The author of the work has died but the work nevertheless survives)

Aeneid IX [9]:

Sceptra Palatini, sedemque petit Euandri (Sought the realm and seat of Palatine Evander) for this is what should be read, and not as is commonly held, 'petivit', for the diphthong Eu is lengthened of necessity.²⁵⁵

Sermones I, satire 9 [565]:

Difficiles aditus primos habet: haud mihi deero
(‘He makes the first approach hard’. ‘I won’t fail’)

Lucretius, Book III [152]:

²⁵³ Misprinted in this edition, and corrected in 1629. ‘it’ is perfect, for ‘iit’.

²⁵⁴ No longer attributed to Ovid. Modern editions read ‘abit’, with the same scansion.

²⁵⁵ ‘petivit’ is an attempt to avoid a fifth-foot spondee, but as Butler says, it is incorrect, since the first syllable of Euandri should be read as a diphthong, not as Ēv-.

Verum ubi vehementi magis est commota metu²⁵⁶ mens
(But when the mind is stirred more by a more fierce alarm)

Horace, Epistles II.2 [120]:

Vehemens et liquidus, puroque simillimus amni
(Forceful and flowing and most like to a pure stream)

Lucretius, Book V [342]:

Per terras, amnes, atque oppida cooperuisse
(That the rivers [had spilt] across the lands and overwhelmed the towns).

Exception

In compound words* short vowels contracted in scansion (dimensio) only are short: as semianimis, semihomo, graveolens.²⁵⁷

* To wit those in which the contracted vowels do not belong to the same part of the compound. See synaeresis [above].

THE THREE GENERAL RULES FOR THE FIRST AND MIDDLE SYLLABLES

A vowel before a vowel

First Rule

I. A vowel that precedes a vowel is short: as děus (god).

²⁵⁶ Misprinted 'mettu' and corrected in 1629.

²⁵⁷ Half-dead, half-human, heavily scented; scanned semānimis, semōmo, gravōlens (in other words the scansion is contracted but the spelling is not).

Exceptions

1. The e in -iei in the genitive and dative of the fifth declension is long, as faciēi (of, to a face)(a.).²⁵⁸

[C1v]

2. The penultimate syllable of pronouns of second declension appearance is common, as unius, illius.²⁵⁹ But in alterius (of the other) it is always short,²⁶⁰ in alius (of the one) always long.

3. The first syllable in fio (I become) is long unless it is followed by -er, as fiērem.²⁶¹

4. Vocatives of proper nouns, and genitives of the first declension (b.) lengthen the penultimate syllable: as Cāi, Pompēi, aulāi, aquāi.²⁶²

5. Ohe (ho there!) has a common first syllable (c.), but eheu (alas!) a long.

6. A vowel preceding another in Greek words (d.) is frequently long, as (1.) Machāon, Pandion, Brisēis, Latōis, Nerēius, Minōus; (2.) Ilonēa, Neronēus; (3.) Thalīa, magīa (sorcery), Medēa, cichorēa (chicory), and the like.

Likewise (4.) āēr (air), Dēiphobus, Pīerides, herōis (of a hero), Enyō, etc. But *Nereis, platea, chorea, conopeum*²⁶³ variously lengthen or shorten the pure²⁶⁴ e.

[Notes to the exceptions]

²⁵⁸ The note cue a is missing in this edition but supplied in 1629. The note itself is misnumbered as q in this edition.

²⁵⁹ Of one, of that.

²⁶⁰ Lewis and Short list some exceptions (s.v. 'alter'). Butler's printer misplaces the short sign.

²⁶¹ 1st person singular, imperfect subjunctive.

²⁶² Addressing Caius and Pompeius; of a hall, of water.

²⁶³ Street, dance, mosquito net.

²⁶⁴ 'Voco autem vocalem puram quae in eadem diction non sequitur consonans' (I call a vowel 'pure' which is not followed by a consonant in the same word): Hannard van Gameraen (Mosaeus), Via Regia ad Musas (Munich, 1567), 'De Primis Syllabis ... Regula Prima'.

a.) Lucretius lengthens this e, even without a preceding [i],²⁶⁵ as

Book II [236]:

Tempore inane potest vacuum subsistere rēi
([At no] time can an empty vacuum provide resistance to a thing)

Book V [102]:

Nec iacere indu manus, via qua munita fidēi
(Nor put it in the hands, by which a path of belief is furnished)

b.) See [above,] diaeresis.

c.) Martial, Book IV, final epigram [89.1 & 9]:

Ohe, iam satis est, ohe, libelle²⁶⁶
(Hallo! Whoa! Now that's enough, little book)

d.) For in some Greek words a pure vowel is lengthened, in some it is shortened, and in some it is either long or short, as is clear in the rules and examples noted below:

1.) Masculines in -āon and -īon, feminine patronymics in -ēis and -ōis, and possessives in -eīus, -oīus and -ōūs lengthen the first vowel of the ending: as Machāon, Amythaon, Didymaon, Lycaon, etc.

Amphīon, Arion, Hyperion, Ixion, Methion, Pandion, etc.

Brisēis, Cadmeis, Chryseis, Echineis, Eleis, etc.

²⁶⁵ Missing in this edition.

²⁶⁶ The first 'ohe' is scanned ˉˉ, the second ˘˘.

Latōis, Deois, Minois, etc.

[C2r]

Nereīūs, Primeius, Semeleius, Elegeius, etc.

Minoīūs, Acheloius, Troius, etc.

Minōūs, Argous, Eous, herous (hero), Inous, Lesbous, Sardous, etc.

Except endings in -aon and -ion arising from a long o: as Phaon, Deucalion, etc.

And in -eis: Nereis, which also shortens the penultimate syllable, as

Metamorphoses XIII [899]:

Discedunt,²⁶⁷ placidisque natant Nerēides undis
(The Nereids depart and swim through the calm waters);

but Aeneid V [240]:

Nerēidum, Phorcique chorus, Panopeaque virgo
(The troop of the Nereids and Phorcus' folk, and the virgin Panopea) and Martial, IV.57 [8]:

Nympharum pariter Nerēidumque domus
(The home equally of nymphs and Nereids)

likewise [Horace,] Odes III.8.²⁶⁸

Neptunum et viridis Nerēidum comas

²⁶⁷ Misprinted as 'discedant'.

²⁶⁸ III.28.10.

(Neptune and the Nereid's green hair).

2.) Accusatives in -ea from nominative -eus, and the possessive in -eus, variously lengthen or shorten the pure e, sometimes following the common dialect, sometimes the Ionian, as:

Orphēa, Salmonēa, Ilionēa, Idomenēa, Caphareus.

Eclogues III [46]:

Orpheaue in medio posuit silvasque sequentis

(In the middle he placed Orpheus and the woods that followed him)

Aeneid VI [585]:

[Vidi]²⁶⁹ et crudeles dantem Salmonea poenas

(I saw too Salmoneus paying a cruel penalty)

Aeneid I [611]:

Ilionea petit dextra, laevaue Serestum

Aeneid VI:²⁷⁰

Idomeneia ducem, desertaue litora Cretae

(... that Idomeneus the leader [had been driven out] and the shores of Crete were deserted);

So Propertius, Book III [7.39]:

²⁶⁹ Misprinted as 'Cidi'.

²⁷⁰ In fact, III.122.

Saxa triumphales fregere Capharĕa puppes
(The rocks of Caphareus broke the victorious ships) and Tristia V.8:²⁷¹

Graia Capherĕa currere puppis aqua²⁷²
(The Greek ship [dared] to run in the waters of Caphareus), but in this case where they are long, they are often written with the diphthong ae, as:

Lucan, Book VIII [716]:

Quaestor ab Icario Cinyra~~ae~~ae littore Cypri
(The quaestor [his companion] from the Icarian shore of Cinyras' land of Cyprus).

It is also found as Cynereius:²⁷³

Statius, Silvae V [1.214]:

Coryciaeque comae, Cinyreiaque germina, et altis (Saffron of Corycus, and myrrh of Cinyras' land, and on a high [bier]) and Cynerĕius:

Ausonius, Epistles 33 [7]:²⁷⁴

Verum aut Persephon[a]e Cinyreĭus ibis Adonis

²⁷¹ V.7.36.

²⁷² Some modern editions read 'Capheream ... aquam'; the scansion is unaffected.

²⁷³ 'ei' scanned as a diphthong.

²⁷⁴ So in old editions e.g. Tollius' (1671); in the 1919 Loeb edition of Ausonius, numbered as Book XIX, epigram 62.7.

(But you shall go either as Cinyras' son, Persephone's Adonis).

The reason for this variety is that the Greek possessives in -εἰος (-eios) in Ionic end -εος (-eos): from which the Latin writers, in imitation of the Greek, write some as -eius, -aeus, -ēūs or -iūs with a long penultimate syllable from the common dialect ending -εἰος, and some as [C2v] -ēūs with a short penultimate syllable from the Ionic ending -εος.

Moreover the Ionians in poetry turn this ending into -ῆϊος (-ēios),²⁷⁵ from which Latin writers also write this in some cases as -ēius with the antepenultimate syllable long, about which see the first rule.

3.) The vowels i and e formed from the diphthong ει (ei) are long, as: Dariūs, Sperchiūs, Clīo, Phthīa, energīa, elegīa, ironīa, magīa; Aenēas, Epēus, Lagēus, cichorēa/-um, centaurēa/-um, panacēa;²⁷⁶ Lycīum or Lycēum; the adjective Chīus (of Chios).

Of this kind are a great number of female names in -ia and -ea, as: Thalīa, Amphigenīa, Deīdamīa, Iphigenīa, Laodamīa, Cassiopīa, Cytherēa, Deiopēa, Galatēa, Medēa, Panopēa.

¶ (It should be noted that the Greek diphthong ει (ei) is written in Latin both as the diphthongs ei and ae, and as long i or e: as Calliopeīa, Panopaea. See rule 2.)

But platea, chorea and *conopeum*²⁷⁷ have both long and short in their penultimate syllables:

Ausonius, Ordo Urbium Nobilium 7:²⁷⁸

Ut mediam facias navali ponte platēam

(That you make a bridge of boats into a street)

²⁷⁵ The printed Greek is far from clear; this is from 1629.

²⁷⁶ Three plants.

²⁷⁷ Street, dance, mosquito net, as above.

²⁷⁸ XI.10.5 in the 1919 Loeb.

In the same book, 9:²⁷⁹

Dispositum et latas nomen servare platēas

(The layout [of the houses] and the streets that deserve their name of broad)

Catullus, to Aurelius [15.7]:

Istos qui in platēa modo huc modo illuc

(Those who in the street, in one direction or another)

Horace, Epistles II.2 [71]:

Purae sunt platēae nihil ut meditantibus obstet

(The streets are clear, so that there's nothing to stop you thinking)

Metamorphoses XIV [520]:

Ad numerum motis pedibus duxere chorēas

(They went to the dance, their feet moving to the measure)

Aeneid VI [644]:

Pars pedibus plaudunt chorēas, et carmina dicunt

(Some tread dances with their feet and recite songs)

Juvenal, Satires VI [80]:

Ut testudineo tibi, Lentule conopēo

(So that for you, Lentulus, in his tortoiseshell net canopy)

²⁷⁹ XI.20.16.

Epodes 9 [15–16]:

Interque signa turpe militaria

Sol aspicit conopœum

(And among the military standards the sun looks shamefaced upon her net canopy)

[C3r]

Chiragra (a gout in the hand), however, has a short i only, although the vowel is not pure, as:

Horace, Epistles I [1.31]:

Nodosa corpus nolis prohibere chiragra

(You don't want knotty gout to impede your body)

Martial, Book I, epigram 99:²⁸⁰

Sed nil patrono porrigit: haec cheragra est

(But he offers nothing to his patron: that is gout in the hands!)

4.) Finally, both long and short vowels before a vowel remain unchanged [from their length in Greek]; also in words formed from [Greek] a and i which can be long or short: for sometimes they are long, sometimes short, being given the quantities in these words that may be most suited to heroic metre.

But masculines in -ius, feminines in -ia and neuters in -ium, along with possessives in -ius, shorten the pure *i*²⁸¹ (unless it comes from the diphthong ει (ei)), as in Parthenius, Chios:

²⁸¹ The first 'nisi' (unless) is misprinted here by dittography; corrected in 1629.

Horace, Epistles I.11 [21]:

Romae laudatur²⁸² Samos, et Chios, et Rhodus absens
(Samos and Chios and distant Rhodes are praised, in Rome)

Academīa, Acedia, Arcadia, harmonia, Maria, naumachia, sophia, symphonia,²⁸³ etc.:

Lucretius, Book IV [1248]:

Nam multum harmoniae Veneris differre videntur (For the harmonies of Venus seem to differ much)

Juvencus, [Evangeliorum,] I [91]:

Exultat Maria, quum prima affamina sensit²⁸⁴
(Mary rejoices when first she senses the approach)

Martial, Book I, epigram 6:²⁸⁵

Do tibi naumachiam, tu das epigrammata nobis
(I give you a sea-battle, you give us epigrams)

Virgil,²⁸⁶ Ciris [4]:

Florentis virides sophiae complectitur umbras

²⁸² Modern editions read 'laudetur' (let them be praised).

²⁸³ Naval battle, wisdom, harmony.

²⁸⁴ This is the line as known to Bede (who quotes it in De Arte Metrica), though modern editors correct to 'Mariae'. In 1629 Butler changes 'quum' to 'cum'.

²⁸⁵ I.5.1.

²⁸⁶ From the Appendix Vergiliana, not now generally attributed to Virgil.

(Is embraced by the green shade of flourishing wisdom)

Horace, Ars Poetica [374]:

Ut gratas inter mensas symphonia discors
(As discordant music among the pleasant tables);

sometimes however, in order that the native [Greek] accent may be kept, it is lengthened, as:

Sedulius, Carmen Paschale II [36]:

Angelus intactae cecinit properata Mariāe
(The angel, approaching the virgin Mary, sang)

Prudentius, Contra Symmachum [34]:

Sortiti aetherae coluerunt dogma sophīae
(Allotted [the crown] they worship the doctrine of heavenly wisdom).

Gymnasīum, etc; Elysīus, Nereīus, etc. But Chīus (of Chios), which comes from εἰ (ei), is lengthened:

Tibullus II.1 [28]:

Consulis, et Chīo solvite vincla cado
(... vintages, and undo the fastening on the jar of Chian wine)

But y is shortened in all cases: as Hŷades, Halcŷones, Libŷa,²⁸⁷ carŷota (a date); except in Enŷo, Thŷas, Cŷaneae.

[C3v]

²⁸⁷ Misprinted as Lŷbia, also in 1629.

Derivation

Second rule for first and middle syllables

II. Derivative words follow the quantity of their root words, as: ānīmus, ānīmosus, ānīmare.²⁸⁸

Exceptions

1. A few words derived from a root with a short syllable lengthen their first syllable, as:

vox, vōcis from *vōco*²⁸⁹

lex, lēgis from *lēgo*²⁹⁰

tēgula from *tēgo*²⁹¹

sēdes from *sēdeo*²⁹²

iūnior from *iūvenis*²⁹³

mācero from *mācer*²⁹⁴

stīpendium from *stīpe*²⁹⁵

stāturus from *stātum*²⁹⁶

lāterna from *lāteo*²⁹⁷

²⁸⁸ Spirit, spirited, to inspirit.

²⁸⁹ 'Voice' (nominative and genitive) from 'I call'.

²⁹⁰ 'Law' (nom. and gen.) from 'I collect' or 'read'; though Lewis and Short connect it etymologically with lēgo, 'I appoint'.

²⁹¹ 'A tile' from 'I cover'.

²⁹² 'A seat' from 'I sit'.

²⁹³ 'Younger' from 'young'.

²⁹⁴ 'I soften, weaken' from 'meager, lean'.

²⁹⁵ 'A payment' from 'a gift' (ablative).

²⁹⁶ 'About to stand' (future participle) from 'to stand' (supine).

²⁹⁷ 'A lamp' from 'I am concealed'. The etymological connection is doubtful.

Rēgina (queen) also lengthens the first syllable, though it comes from [rex,] rege (king), as heroīna comes from [herous,] heroe.²⁹⁸

Stāturus and its compounds which keep the a, as constāturus, prostāturus, obstāturus, exstāturus,²⁹⁹ have that a as long.

Lucan, Book II [566]:

Hinc acies statura ducum est, Caesarne senatus

(Here I have an army of leaders under arms: [will] Caesar [be victor over] the Senate?)

Thebaid VII [247]:

Quae sic orsa prior, spesne obstatura Pelasgis

(And she began to speak first: Is there hope [these troops] can stand against the Pelasgians?)

Martial, X.41 [5]:

Constatura fuit Megalensis purpura centum

(His purple toga for the games of Magna Mater was going to cost a hundred [thousand])

Lucan, II [16–17]:

Ergo, ubi concipiunt quantis sit cladibus orbi

Constatura fides superum

(So, when they grasped the extent of the disasters which the gods' truth made known there would be for the world)

²⁹⁸ 'Heroine', 'hero'. Butler gives the root words in the ablative.

²⁹⁹ Future participles of consto (I stand together, accord, cost); prosto (I stand forth, am for sale); obsto (I stand in the way); exsto (I stand out, exist). Some compounds of sto change the a to an i: see below.

Those which exchange the a for an i keep the quantity of the supine: as praestitūrus, restitūrus, institūrus.³⁰⁰ Lucretius, Book II.³⁰¹

2. A few words derived from a root with a long syllable shorten their first syllable:

dux, dūcis from dūco³⁰²

dīcax and -dīcus at the end of a word* from dīco³⁰³

*as: maledicus, causidicus, etc.

fīdes from fido³⁰⁴

sōpor from sōpio³⁰⁵

nōto, nōtas from nōtu³⁰⁶

nāto, nātas from nātu³⁰⁷

vāricosus from vārix³⁰⁸

ōdium from ōdi³⁰⁹

lūcerna from lūceo³¹⁰

[C4r]

³⁰⁰ Future participles of praesto (I stand out); resto (I withstand); insto (I press upon).

³⁰¹ This curious reference is retained in 1629 but it is unclear what it refers to. None of the three words just mentioned appears in Lucretius, Book II.

³⁰² 'Leader' (nom. and gen.) from 'I lead'.

³⁰³ 'Satirical' from 'I speak'; maledicus: 'abusive', causidicus: 'advocate'.

³⁰⁴ 'Faith' from 'I trust'.

³⁰⁵ 'Sleep' from 'I sleep'.

³⁰⁶ 'I, you mark'. 'Notu' is not Classical Latin.

³⁰⁷ 'I, you swim'. 'Natu', birth, does not appear to be connected.

³⁰⁸ 'Varicose' from 'a dilated vein'.

³⁰⁹ 'Hatred' from 'I hate'.

³¹⁰ 'Lamp' from 'I light'.

Desiderative words coming from participles with long penultimate syllables shorten that syllable: as esūrit (s/he hungers) from esūrus (about to eat). So, partūrio, nupturio, coenaturio, dormiturio, micturio, scalpturio, etc.³¹¹

Motor, motio, motus, *mobilis*³¹² with a long first syllable, and stator, statio, status, *stabilis*³¹³ with a short first syllable, follow the quantities of the supines [mōtum, stātum] from which they are derived. Therefore, they are not exceptions, as some teach, seeing that the first syllable in move is short and the first in stare is long.

¶ It is frequently the case that when some letter is changed, the quantity is also changed: as fomes and fomentum, with a long first syllable, from foveo, with a short;³¹⁴ so iūcundus from iūvo, hūmanus from hōmo;³¹⁵ but posui, genui, fragor and fragilis are short, though derived from pono, gigno and frango, which have long first syllables.³¹⁶

Making Compound words

Third general rule for first and middle syllables

III. Compound words follow the quantity of the uncompounded ones, as ānīmare, exānīmare (to inspirit, to put out of breath).

Accordingly whatever is the first syllable of an uncompounded two-syllable word is shown³¹⁷ in the accentuation of the compound, as:

impūrus/pūrus;³¹⁸ versicōlor/cōlor (impure/pure; multicoloured/colour).

Exceptions

³¹¹ I am in labour, I desire to marry, I have an appetite for dinner, I am drowsy, I need to pee, I scratch.

³¹² Mover, movement, motion, mobile.

³¹³ Stander, standing, station, stable.

³¹⁴ 'Kindling', 'poultice' from 'I warm'.

³¹⁵ 'Jolly, pleasant' from 'I please'; 'human' from 'man'.

³¹⁶ 'I placed', 'I gave birth', 'crash', 'fragile', from 'I place', 'I give birth', 'I break'.

³¹⁷ 'Ostenditur' for the misprinted 'ostnditur'.

³¹⁸ Butler's point is not helped by misprinting as pūrus; corrected in 1629.

1. The following shorten the long first syllable of the uncompounded word: innŭba, pronŭba from nŭbo; deiĕro, peiĕro from iŭro (a.).³¹⁹
2. The following lengthen the short first syllable of the uncompounded word: ambĭtus (b.) from ĭtus to differentiate it from the noun; ĭdem (masculine) from ĭs, for the neuter ĭdem has a short first syllable.³²⁰

[Notes to exception 2]

a.) To which add cognĭtum and agnĭtum (known, recognised) from nŏtum (known).

b.) Metamorphoses I [37]:

lussit et ambĭtae circumdare litora terrae
(And he ordered [the sea] to surround the shores of the encircled land)

Claudian, De III Consulatu Honorii [186]:

Cumque suo demens expellitur ambĭtus auro
(And insane ambition is driven out along with its gold)

3. Utĭque, sĭquidem, vidĕsis and *valĕdico*³²¹ shorten the long final syllable of the uncompounded word.

[C4v]

Lucretius, II [569]:

Nec superare queunt motus utique³²² exitiales

³¹⁹ 'Unmarried', 'bridesmaid' from 'I marry'; 'I take an oath', 'I swear falsely' from 'I swear'.

³²⁰ Ambĭtus, past participle of ambio, 'to encompass', as opposed to ambĭtus, 'a circuit, ambition'; ĭtus derives from eo, 'I go'. Īdem and ĭdem: 'the same', from is 'that, he'.

³²¹ In any case, if only/since indeed, see/take care, I bid farewell.

³²² Modern editions read 'itaque'.

(Nor can these deadly motions in any case prevail)

Maximianus,³²³ Elegies V [69]:

Obtundunt siquidem curarum pondera sensus
(For the weight of cares indeed oppresses the senses)

Persius, Satires I [108]:

Auriculas? videsis ne maiorum tibi forte
(... little ears? Take care that [the doorways] of those greater than you don't happen to [grow cold] for you)

Tristia, Book I, elegy 7:³²⁴

Idque quod ignoti faciunt valedicere saltem³²⁵
(And at least bid farewell as strangers do)

4. In quandōque, ubīque and *ibīdem³²⁶ only, the common final syllable of the uncompounded word is lengthened; in quandōquidem and *ubīvis*³²⁷ it is short; but in ubicunque, like in the uncompounded [ubi],³²⁸ it can be either long or short, as:

Aeneid VII [400]:

³²³ Called by Butler 'Gallus', as he was inaccurately known after the Renaissance; see A.M. Juster, medievalists.net/2018/05/maximianus-gallus-and-the-great-medieval-literary-fraud (accessed 11 January 2023).

³²⁴ I.8.21.

³²⁵ Modern editions follow Merkel's correction 'vel dicere'.

³²⁶ Whenever, wherever, in the same place.

³²⁷ Since indeed, where you will. According to Lewis and Short quandōquidem is the usual scansion except for one example each in Virgil and Lucretius where the o is short.

³²⁸ Wheresoever, where/when.

Clamat io³²⁹ matres, audite ubīcunque³³⁰ Latinae
(She cries out: io, mothers of Latium, wherever you are, hear me)

Metamorphoses VII [736]:

Servor; ubīcunque est, uni mea gaudia servo
(I serve [one man]; wherever he is, I keep my joys for one man)

* Ibidem in the old writers, Lucretius, Virgil etc. is long only; but Mamertus dared to shorten it.

[Contra Poetas Vanos, 48]:

Cognosces ibidem, ne pergas tradere fati³³¹
(You will know, in the same place, lest you undertake to betray to the fates)

You may add this fifth rule:

5. Every vowel coming before a q, unless it is lengthened by another rule, is short; as nēque, nēqueo, līqueo, etc.³³²

Except the rivers Sēquana (Seine) and Līquetius (Livenza, in Venezia), and the verb līquor (I am fluid), whose participle also has a long i, as:

Aeneid I [432]:

³²⁹ Misprinted 'iō'; corrected to 'iō' in 1629. The o is long.

³³⁰ Modern editions read 'ubi quaeque'.

³³¹ Attributed, probably wrongly, to Claudianus Mamertus, and also to Paulinus of Nola. Some authorities read 'itidem' (in the same way), avoiding the metrical problem.

³³² Nor, I cannot, I am liquid/clear.

... aut cum liquentia mella (Or when [they pack] oozing honey);

but [the participle] from līqueo has a short i, as:

Aeneid VI [724]:

Principio caelum ac terras camposque liquentis
(First, the heaven and earth and the watery plains), coming from which liquidus (liquid) and liquor (a fluid, fluidity) may be long or short, but in many cases are short:

Lucretius, IV [1259]:

Crassaque convenient līquidis et līquida crassis
(The thick should mix with the fluid, and the fluid with the thick)

the same, Book I [453]:

Pondus uti saxi, calor ignis, līquor aquai
(As weight is a property of rocks, heat of fire, liquidness of water)

For it is clear enough that aequus, inīquus, antīquus, oblīquus, quāque, nequāquam, utrōque, aliōqui,³³³ and compounds of nē, the adverb of prohibition, such as nēquis, nēquando, nēquam, nēquitia, nēquaquam, *nēquicquam*³³⁴ and the like have long vowels by the other rules.

³³³ Just, unjust, ancient, oblique, whithersoever, in vain, in both directions, otherwise.

³³⁴ Lest anyone, lest at any time, worthless, worthlessness, in vain, in vain.

Nēqueo (I cannot) can be said to be a compound not of nē but of nec (and not), as also the other ne- words with a short e: nefas, nefastus, nefarius, nefandus, etc.³³⁵

[C5r]

The first and middle syllables of proper nouns

¶ In proper names, unless the nature of the syllable is against it, the poets often vary the first and middle syllables, doubtless using the quantity that fits their metres most easily.³³⁶

Claudian, Raptus Proserpinae III [332]:

Lucus erat prope flumen Ācin, quod candida praefert
(There was a grove beside the River Acis, a river which the white [Galatea] prefers)

Fasti IV [468]:

Praeterit et ripas herbifer Āci tuas
(She passes your banks, too, grassy Acis)

Silius Italicus, III [608]:

Iam puer auricomo performidate Batāvo
(Already, as a boy, feared by the golden-haired Batavians)

Lucan, I [431]:

³³⁵ Wickedness, wicked, nefarious, unspeakable.

³³⁶ Several hundred years of textual scholarship since Butler's day have, apparently, discounted a number, though not all, of these discrepancies.

Vangiones, Batāvique truces, quos aere recurvo
(Vangiones and savage Batavians, whom with curved bronze)

Claudian, In Eutropium II [20.239]:

Proxima Bīthynos:³³⁷ solem quae condit Ionas (Nearest the Bithynians; on the sunset side, the Ionians)

in the same [20.247]:

Thyni Thraces erant³³⁸ quae nunc Bīthynia fertur
(The Thracian Thyni were [in?] what is now called Bithynia)

Horace, Epistles I.6 [33]:

Ne Cibyrica, ne Bīthyna negotia perdas (That you do not lose your business in Cibra or Bithynia)

Catullus, to Sirmio [31.5]:

Vix mihi ipse credens Thuniam Bīthynosque³³⁹
(Scarcely myself believing [I've left] Thynia and the Bithynian [plains])

Juvenal, Satires VII [15]:

Quamquam et Cappadoces faciant equitesque Bīthyni

³³⁷ Butler's printer misprints the quantities here; they are corrected in 1629.

³³⁸ Modern editions read 'arant' (cultivate).

³³⁹ But modern editions read 'atque Bīthynos'.

(Although the knights of Cappadocia and Bithynia do that too)³⁴⁰

Metamorphoses IX [183]:

Būsīrim domui? saevoque alimenta parentis

(Did I [for this] vanquish Busiris? Or [snatched] from savage [Antaeus] the nourishment of his mother)

Thebaid XII [155]:

Luctibus immites citius Būsīridos aras

(To your grief: sooner the inexorable altars of Busiris)

in the same [576]:

Non trucibus monstribus Būsīrim³⁴¹ infandumque dedisti

(You did not give Busiris and the unspeakable [Cercyon] to savage monsters)

Fasti I [551]:

Cācus Aventinae timor atque infamia sylvae

(Cacus, terror of the Aventine, who gave the wood its ill repute)

Metamorphoses IX [197a]:³⁴²

His Cācus horrendum Tyberino in gurgite monstrum

(With these [arms] Cacus threw the frightful monster in the Tiber's gushing stream)

³⁴⁰ A line excluded by modern editors, following Pinzger, as spurious. There are, in fact, no other classical examples of Bithyni scanned with a short i.

³⁴¹ But modern editions correct to 'Sinin'. There seem to be no other classical examples with a short u.

³⁴² Excluded in modern editions as spurious. Again, Cacus is universally scanned with a long a otherwise.

Aeneid III [111]:

Huic mater cultrix Cybēle Corybantiaque aera³⁴³

(To this came the mother dweller, Cybele, and the Corybantes' bronze cymbals)

Aeneid X [220]:

Occurrit comitum: nymphe quas alma Cybēle³⁴⁴

([A troop] of her companions ran: nymphs whom mother Cybele)

Aeneid III [681]:

Constiterant,³⁴⁵ sylva alta Iovis lucusve Dīanae

(They had stood, a tall wood of Jupiter or grove of Diana)

Aeneid I [499]:

Exercet Dīana choros, quam mille sequutae

(Diana leads the dances, whom a thousand following)

[Horace,] Odes I.21 [1]:

Dīanam tenerae dicite virgines

(Sing Diana, you tender virgins)

Horaces, Epistles I.11 [7–8]:

³⁴³ Corrected in 1629 from misprinted 'ara'. Modern editions read 'Hinc' for 'Huic'; and also Cybeli – 'the mother, dweller of Mt Cybelus' (alternatively Cybelae, of Mt. Cybele or Cybela). The scansion is unaffected.

³⁴⁴ But in modern editions corrected to Cybēbe (the two forms of the name follow the Greek Κυβέλη (Kubēlē) and Κυβήβη (Kubēbē)).

³⁴⁵ Modern editions (and Servius) read 'constiterunt' (they stand).

Scis, Lebedus quam³⁴⁶ sit Gabiis desertior atque

Fīdenis vicus;

(You know how Lebedus is a more deserted neighbourhood than Gabii and Fidenae)

[C5v]

Aeneid VI [773]:

Hi tibi Nomentum et Gabios, urbemque Fīdenam

(These [will build] Nomentum and Gabii and the town of Fidenae)

Aeneid III [35]:

Grādivumque patrem Geticis qui praesidet arvis

(And father Gradivus who presides over the Thracian fields)

Metamorphoses XV [863]:

Urbis et invicti genitor Grādive Quirini

(Of our city, and Mars Gradivus, father of the invincible Romulus)

Metamorphoses IX:³⁴⁷

Et genus a magno ducentem forte Grādivo

(And as it happens tracing his descent from great Mars Gradivus)

Aeneid IX [762]:

Principio Phalerim, et succiso poplite Gygen

³⁴⁶ Modern editions read 'quid'.

³⁴⁷ VI.427.

(First [he caught] Phaleris and Gyges, cutting through his thigh)

Tristia IV, elegy 6:³⁴⁸

Centimanumque Gŷgen semibovemque virum

(And hundred-handed Gyges and the half-cow, half-man)

Heroides 6 [44]:

At mihi nec Iuno, nec Hŷmen, sed tristis Erinnys

(But for me not Juno, nor Hymen, but the dismal Fury)

Catullus, Carmen Nuptiale [62.5]:

Hŷmen, o Hymenaeae, Hŷmen ades o Hymenaeae³⁴⁹

(Hymen, O Hymenaeus, Hymen come, O Hymenaeus)

Aeneid X [315]:

Inde Lŷcam ferit exsectum iam matre perempta

(Then he struck Lycas, once cut from his dead mother)

in the same book [561]:

Protinus Antheum et Lŷcam prima agmina Turni³⁵⁰

(Immediately he [presses on] Antheus and Lycas in Turnus' front rank)

³⁴⁸ IV.7.18; but modern editions read 'Gŷen'.

³⁴⁹ The y of Hŷmenaeae is short.

³⁵⁰ But modern editions distinguish between Lŷchas (X.315) and Lŷcas (X.561), unsurprisingly, since the clear implication is that the former is killed, so can't still be in the battle two hundred lines later.

Lucan, III [277]:

Quaque fretum torrens Maēotidis egerit undas
(And where the boiling strait drives the waters of Maeotis)

Aeneid VI [799]:

Responsis horrent divum et Maēotica tellus
(... and the Maeotian land tremble at the gods' oracles)

Tristia III.12 [2]:

Longior antiquis visa Maëotis hiems
(A winter on the Black Sea that seemed longer than of old)

Aeneid V [193]:

Ionioque mari Malëaeque sequacibus undis
(In the Ionian Sea and the chasing waves of Cape Malea)

[Ovid, Amores] II.16 [24]:

Nec timeam vestros curva Malëa sinus
(Nor, bent Malea, do I fear your bays)

Orion, [genitive] Orionis, in Greek Ὠρίων, Ὠρίωνος (Ōriōn, Ōriōnos), has by nature a long first and third syllable; but the poets make it short or long:

Lucan, IX [836]:

Teste tulit caelo victi decus Ōriōnis

(As the heaven is witness, [Scorpio] bore the glory of Orion's defeat)

Aeneid III [517]:

Armatumque auro circumspicit Ōriōna

(And observes Orion, armed with gold)

Metamorphoses XIII [294]:

Diversasque urbes³⁵¹ nitidumque Ōriōnis ensem

(The different cities and Orion's shining sword)

in the same book [692]:

Ecce facit mediis natas ab Ōriōne³⁵² Thebis

(Look, in the midst of Thebes he pictures the daughters born of Orion)

Aeneid I:³⁵³

Saevus ubi Ōriōn hybernis conditur undis

(When wild Orion is hidden by the wintry waves)

Aeneid I [535]:

Cum subito adsurgens fluctu nimbosus Ōrion³⁵⁴

³⁵¹ Modern editions read 'diversosque orbes' (the different stars).

³⁵² But modern editions dispense with 'ab', so scanning Ōriōne.

³⁵³ VII.719.

³⁵⁴ The final -on is anceps (can be either long or short).

(When stormy Orion rising with a sudden surge)

Metamorphoses XII [262]:

Oppressitque duos, Brotean et Öriön: Örio³⁵⁵

(He crushed two of them, Broteas and Orios; Orios' [mother])

Aeneid III [429]:

Praestat Trinacrii metas lustrare Pächini

(Preferable is to go past the turning-point of Sicilian Cape Pachynus)

Metamorphoses V [351]:

Laeva Pächine tibi, Lilybaeo crura premuntur

(His left hand is held down by you, Pachynus, and his legs by Lilybaeum)

[C6r]

Metamorphoses XIII [725]:

E quibus imbriferos versa est Pächynos ad Austros³⁵⁶

(Of these Pachynos is turned to face the south's rainstorms)

Metamorphoses I [155]:

Fulmine et excussit subiecto Pēlŏn Ossae

(And with his lightning bolt cut Pelion away from Ossa beneath)

³⁵⁵ But this is not Orion, but rather the Lapith Orios. Modern editions reread 'Depressitque'.

³⁵⁶ But modern editions read 'est versa Pächynos'.

Silius Italicus, III [495]:

Ossaque cum Pēlio³⁵⁷ cumque Haemo cesserit Othrys
(And Ossa with Pelion, and Othrys with Haemus, yield place)

[Horace,] Epodes 16 [4]:

Minacis aut Etrusca Porsēnae manus
(Or the Etruscan band of threatening Porsena)

Martial, I.22:³⁵⁸

Hanc spectare manum Porsēna non potuit
(That hand Porsena could not bear to look on)

Nec repetita sequi curat Prōserpina matrem
(Nor does the reclaimed Proserpina care to follow her mother)

Seneca, Hercules Furens, Act II [549]:

³⁵⁷ Scanned as a dissyllable, according to Lewis and Short, merging the i and o by synaeresis (rather than as a trisyllable with a short e).

³⁵⁸ I.21.6.

Vidisti Sicalae regna Pröserpinae
(You see the realms of Sicilian Proserpina)

Tibullus, Book I [7.9]:

Non sane est tibi partus honos: per bella Pÿrene³⁵⁹
(Not indeed is your honour won: through your wars the Pyrenees)

Lucan, Book IV [83]:

Iamque Pÿrenaeae quas numquam solvere Titan
(And now the Pyrenean [snows], which the Titan sun [was] never [able] to melt)

Silius Italicus, Book III [417–18]:

Pÿrene celsa nimborum verticis arce
Divisos Celtis alte³⁶⁰ prospectat Hiberos
(From the lofty citadel of its cloudy summit, the Pyrenees look out on high over the Iberi divided from the Gaulish Celts)

Claudian, *De Bello Getico*³⁶¹[26.215]:

Trans freta, trans Gallos, Pyrenaeumque cucurrit?
([Did it not] run across the straits, across Gaul and the Pyrenees?)

Aeneid VII [659]:

Collis Aventini sylva quem Rhēa Sacerdos

³⁵⁹ Modern editions read 'Non sine me est tibi partus honos: Tarbella Pyrene' (Not without me was your honour won: the Tarbellian Pyrenees); the scansion is unaffected.

³⁶⁰ Modern editions read 'late' (wide).

³⁶¹ i.e. Gothico.

(Whom Rhea the priestess, in the wood on the Aventine hill)

Fasti IV [201]:

Saepe Rhēa³⁶² questa est, totiens faecunda, nec umquam

(Often Rhea complained that so often she was pregnant yet never [a mother])

(Rhodes slopes down into the open Carpathian sea)

Martial, Book IX, epigram 30:³⁶⁴

Vincebant, nec quae turba Serāpin amat

([Could not] overpower [her], nor the throng that worships Serapis)

the same:³⁶⁵

³⁶² But this is a different name, an alternative for Cybele (Greek Ῥέα, Rhēa).

³⁶³ Not Lucan but a fragment of Lucilius (1291 Marx) quoted by Pomponius Porphyrio, Commentum in Horati Carmina I.7.1.

³⁶⁴ IX.29.6.

³⁶⁵ Not Martial but Martianus Capella, De nuptiis Philologiae et Mercurii II.191–2. The line appears in different form in later editions of Martianus, making more sense, but the scansion remains the same.

Isaeum Serăpin Nilus veneratur Osirim
(The Nile worships Isis' Serapis [and] Osiris)

Aeneid I [343]:

Huic coniux Sīchaeus erat ditissimus agri
(Her husband was Sychaeus, wealthiest in land)

in the same book [348]:

Quos inter medius venit furor ille Sīchaeum³⁶⁶
(A madness comes between them, and he [overpowers] Sychaeus)

Aeneid IV [670]:

Carthago, aut antiqua Týros, fla[m]maeque furentes
([As if] Carthage or ancient Tyre [were falling] and raging fires)

Metamorphoses XV [288]:

³⁶⁶ Butler reads 'Sychaeus' in error (also in 1629); the scansion is unaffected.

Et Phoenissa Týros quarum nunc insula nulla est
(And Phoenician Tyre, none of which is now an island)

[C6v]

Metamorphoses III [539]:

A Týro,³⁶⁷ hac profugos posuistis sede Penates
(A refugee from Tyre, in this house you placed your household gods)

Juvenal, VI [344]:

Et Vatīcano fragiles de monte patellas
(And the fragile little plates from the Vatican hill)

[Horace,] Odes I.20 [7–8]:

Redderet laudes tibi Vatīcani
montis imago
([That] an echo from the Vatican hill might return your praise).

In the same way as this they do not make a point of giving the same quantities to cognate words, as:

Aeneid III [1]:

Postquam res Āsiae, Priamique evertere gentem
(After [the gods' will had been] to destroy the kingdom of Asia and people of Priam)

Georgics IV [343]:

³⁶⁷ But modern editions correct to 'Hac Týron'.

(And Ephyre and Opis, and Asian Deiopea)

(Not so the fearsome Cimbri nor the Britons ever)

Tutari Ītaliā, detrudere finibus hostem
(To defend Italy and drive the enemy from its borders)

Aeneid XI [657]:

Ītalides: quas ipsa decus sibi dia Camilla

³⁶⁸ Misprinted 'Ephyre' and corrected in 1629. Modern editions prefer 'Ephyre'; also reading 'et' for the third 'atque' (which requires the second syllable of 'Opis' to be scanned long; instead, modern editors read a hiatus after 'Ephyre' in keeping with the Greek rhythm of this line; see e.g. R.D. Williams (London and Basingstoke, 1979) ad loc.)

(The daughters of Italy, whom godlike Camilla [chose] for herself as her ornament)

Metamorphoses XIII:³⁶⁹

Graia quis Ītalīcis author posuisset in oris

(What founder had placed a Greek [city] on the shores of Italy)

Aeneid III [185]:

Et saepe Hesperiam saepe Ītala regna vocare

(And often spoke of Hesperia, and of the Italian realms)

(Rocks which, lying in the middle of the waves, the Italians call ‘the altars’)

in the same [252]:

(We were betrayed, and were driven far off from Italian shores)

Aeneid I [258]:

Fata tibi cernes urbem et promissa Lāvini

Moenia

(Your fate [remain unchanged]: you will see the city and promised walls of Lavinium)

³⁶⁹ XV.9.

Nec prolem Ausoniam, et Lāvinia respicit arva
(And pays no heed to Italy and the fields of Lavinium)

At freta Sicāniae saltem sedesque paratas
(At least [let us make for] the Sicilian straits and the home prepared for us)

Aeneid III [692]:

Sicānio praetenta sinu iacet insula contra
(An island lies stretched out in the Sicilian gulf, opposite [Plemyrium])

Silius Italicus, XIV [258]:

Caetera Elysaeis aderat gens Sicāna votis
(The rest of the people of Sicily came with vows of loyalty to Carthage)

in the same book [34]:

³⁷⁰ 16.1.

Vomere verterunt primum nova rura Sīcāno
(The first to turn over the virgin lands with a Sicanian plough)

Eclogues X [4]:

Sic tibi cum fluctus subter labere Sīcānos

[C7r]

Heroides 21:³⁷¹

Quid mihi cum Lesbo Sīcelis esse volo
(What is Lesbos to me? I would be with the Sicilians)

³⁷¹ XV.52.

Tybris (the Tiber) to be sure has a long first syllable, as:

Aeneid VIII [330–31]:

Tum reges, asperque immani corpore Tȳbris

A quo post Itali fluvium cognomine Tȳbrim

(Then kings, and violent Thybris with his huge body, from whom afterwards we Italians afterwards [called] the river by the name Thybris)

But Tyberis is short, as:

Georgics I [499]:

Qua³⁷² Tuscum Tȳberim et Romana palatia servas

(Whereby you look after Tuscan Tiber and the palaces of Rome)

Aeneid X [833]:

Interea genitor Tȳberini ad fluminis undam

(Meanwhile the father, in the water of Tiber's river)

Having observed these in passing, I leave others to your careful attention. This licence later poets, imitating the ancients, also avail themselves of, as:

Ausonius, Idyllium I [14]:

Deceptum miseratus Ādam; quem capta venenis

(Having mercy on the deceived Adam, whom [Eve], in thrall to evil)

³⁷² Modern editions read 'Quae' (who).

Prudentius, Enchiridion:³⁷³

Tinxit ei³⁷⁴ innocuum maculis sordentibus Ādam
(Tainted for him(?) the innocent Adam with filthy stains)

Prudentius, Peristephanon [X.829]:

Deo offerendum, sancti Ābelis ferculo (Carried by holy Abel to be offered to God)

the same, Enchiridion:³⁷⁵

Rusticus invidia pastorem sternit: in Ābel
The peasant lays the shepherd low from jealousy: in Abel)

[George] Buchanan, Psalm 2:³⁷⁶

Utque bonus dubiis, lācobum ad sydera rebus
(And as in his goodness [he heard] Jacob [calling] to the heavens in time of distress)

[the same,] Psalm 135 [6]:

Quippe lācobum ultro legit, lectumque dicavit (For indeed he has of his own will chosen Jacob, and set him apart, a chosen one) the same, in the same psalm [24]:

³⁷³ Dittochaeon, 1.3.

³⁷⁴ Modern editions read ‘et’ (also).

³⁷⁵ Dittochaeon, 2.7.

³⁷⁶ In fact, 20.5.

Quique Basana Ōgus magna ditione tenebat
(And Og who held Bashan with great power)

[the same,] Psalm 136 [35]:

Stravit Ōgum magno fidentem corpore frustra³⁷⁷
(He slew Og who trusted vainly in his own strength)

THREE SPECIFIC RULES FOR FIRST SYLLABLES

The Prepositional Prefix

First Rule

I. In compound words the preposition retains its quantity, as trāduco (I betray); unless it is impossible because of position, as āddo, rēiicio (I add, I reject), or where a vowel comes before a vowel, as dēhiscens, praëustus (gaping, fire-hardened).³⁷⁸

Also the quantities of those prepositions which are never found except in compounds (such as am-, di-, dis-, re-, se-, con-) are to be understood by the common rules for all words. For indeed am- and dis- are always long by position,³⁷⁹ and also con-, unless a vowel follows, or the [C7V] n is omitted, as cōacervo (I heap up) – for then the vowel is short before another vowel – or the n changes into an m, as comedo (I eat up): and then it is short, for a final m was short in archaic times, which is still apparent in compounds such as circumago, circumeo (I drive round, I go round). Di- is long as it ends in i; se- likewise as it is a monosyllable in e; but re-, short, is an exception.

³⁷⁷ In later editions Buchanan rewrote this line; in the revised version 'Ogum' is scanned long.

³⁷⁸ From prepositions trāns-, ād-, rē-, dē-, praē-.

³⁷⁹ Being only ever followed by another consonant.

Exceptions

1. Di- is short in dīrimo and dīsertus (I separate; eloquent).

2. Pro- is short in prōcella, prōfari, prōfiteor, prōfugio, prōficiscor, prōnepos, prōneptis, prōfanus, prōfestus, prōfundus, prōfecto.³⁸⁰

3. Procuro, profundo, propello, propulso and propago^{*381} have a first syllable either long or short.

* Noun and verb.³⁸²

The noun propago is properly used for an old vine or the young vine-sprout which is propagated from it¶:

¶ For the science of propagation, see Pliny, [Natural History] XVII, chapter 17 [27]. Branches are planted in a ditch in the earth, are pruned after two years and transplanted the following year.³⁸³ by transference from which it signifies a race and lineage, or even the offspring and progeny that are thereby born. In the former sense Virgil lengthens it twice:

Georgics II [63]:

Sed truncis oleae melius, prōpagine vites

(But olives [respond] better from trunk-stems, vines from layering)

in the same [26]:

Silvarumque aliae pressos prōpaginis arcus

³⁸⁰ Gale, to speak out, I profess, I flee, I set out, great-grandson, great-granddaughter, profane, a working day, deep, actually.

³⁸¹ I take care of, pour forth, drive forward, repel; propago: I propagate or extend to posterity (verb) or propagated shoot/layer, or race/offspring (noun).

³⁸² Marginal note, cut off in the EEBO/Folger copy; here supplied from 1629 (also the following note marked ¶).

³⁸³ Butler here simplifies a rather complicated subject, which extends well beyond the chapter he refers to.

(Other trees of the woods [await] the bent arc of layering) and in the latter he shortens it twice:

Aeneid VI [870]:

Esse sinent: nimium vobis Romana prōpago

(Will not allow [him] to live [longer]: the Roman race [would seem] too [powerful] to you)

Aeneid XII [827]:

Sit Romana potens Itala virtute prōpago

(Let there be a Roman race powerful with Italian virtue) from which some take it that this word used in its original meaning has a long first syllable, but in the metaphorical sense has a short: but propago the verb can have its first syllable either long or short, even in the metaphorical sense:

Lucretius, V [850]:

Ut prōpagando possint procudere saecula

(So that by propagating they may forge the generations)

in the same [856]:

Nec potuisse prōpagando procudere prolem

(Nor were able to produce offspring by propagation)

And so Virgil seems to me to have intended nothing more by this variation than to make the noun common in its first syllable, as Lucretius did with the verb: in one place he shortens it, in another he lengthens it, as the metre requires, not desiring a difference of meaning. For it is not the custom for a trope to change a quantity: but follow your own judgement.

In *probo, probus, probrum, proprius, procax, procus, procul, procures, prope, propero, propinquus, protervus*³⁸⁴ (which have short first syllables) the prepositional prefix pro- is not to be imagined: probrum and proprius (proper) can also lengthen their first syllable, but this is not [C8r] by nature but by virtue of the following mute and liquid.

The Greek prepositional prefix pro- is short, as it is written with an omicron:³⁸⁵ as in prōpheta, prōpino, prōpola, Prōpontis, prōlogus, Prōmetheus, etc.³⁸⁶

Re- in refert used impersonally is long, as in:

Quid tamen hoc rēfert, si se pro classe Pelasga

Arma tulisse rēfert³⁸⁷

(What does it boot him, if he says he bore arms on behalf of the Greek fleet?)

but the grammarians say that this [impersonal use] is compounded from the noun rē (a matter), and not the preposition.

Disyllables in the perfect and supine

Second rule for first syllables

II. Disyllabic perfects and supines have a long first syllable: as mōvi, mōtum (from moveo, I move).

Exceptions

³⁸⁴ I approve, estimable, disgrace, shameless, a suitor, far from, nobles, near, I hurry, nearby, forward.

³⁸⁵ The Greek short o.

³⁸⁶ Prophet, I drink a health, a huckster, the Sea of Marmara, prologue, Prometheus.

³⁸⁷ Metamorphoses XIII.268–9.

Six perfects: bībi, fīdi, dēdi, scīdi, stēti, tūli;³⁸⁸ and ten supines: quītum, sītum, lītum, ītum, rūtum, fātum, dātum, sātum, stātum and cītum (from cīeo, cīes)*³⁸⁹ have short first syllables.

* Since cītum from cīo, cīs has a long first syllable.³⁹⁰

Reduplicated perfects

Third rule for first syllables

III. Perfects that reduplicate the first syllable [of their root] have a short first syllable: as pūpugi, tētendi, cēcīdi, cēcīdi.³⁹¹

THREE SPECIFIC RULES FOR MIDDLE SYLLABLES

Accent [or word stress]

First rule

I. The accent³⁹² in a word of more than two syllables shows us [C8v] the quantity of the penultimate syllable, as dóminus, *humánu*s (lord, human).

³⁸⁸ I drank, I split, I gave, I cut, I stood, I bore.

³⁸⁹ From the verbs to be able, to allow, to daub, to go, to fall in ruin, to speak, to give, to sow, to stand, to excite. It was the practice to refer to verbs by the first two persons of the present tense (cīeo, cīes: I excite, you excite) rather than, as became the norm later, by the first person present and present infinitive (e.g. cīeo, cīere: I excite, to excite).

³⁹⁰ Lewis and Short list cīo, cīs as a primitive form of the same verb and make no mention of the long supine (vide s.v. cīeo) though compounds such as accīo have a long i in the supine.

³⁹¹ I pricked, I stretched, I fell, I cut/killed.

³⁹² By which is meant the position of the principle stressed syllable.

For if the antepenultimate is stressed, the penultimate is short: as dómīnus, and sánguīnis, légĕre (of blood; to gather/choose/read); if the penultimate syllable is stressed, then it is long: as humānus, and virtūtis, amāre (of virtue, to love).

Compounds of dare (to give) which are of the first conjugation do not conform to it³⁹³ in accent and quantity, since the uncompounded verb [dare] has a short ă in all its forms; as dăre, circúndăre; dăbis, *pessúndăbis*³⁹⁴, since otherwise the characteristic vowel of the first conjugation [a] as also of the second and fourth [e and i] is always long, as stāre, flēre, scīre.³⁹⁵

Adjectives in -inus stress the penultimate syllable, from which it is apparent that it is long, as matutīnus (of the morning); except for diutīnus, pristīnus, crastīnus, perendīnus, hornotīnus, serotīnus;³⁹⁶ and material adjectives, as fagīnus, oleagīnus, crystallīnus, adamantīnus, coccīnus, carbasīnus.³⁹⁷ Adjectives in -osus, and perfects in -vi and their supines have the stress on the penultimate, as animósus (courageous), petívi, petítum (perfect and supine of peto, I seek).

Sometimes the quantities of several syllables in the same word can be known by the accent, as three in penĕtrābilis (able to be penetrated): -bi- [is short] because this is the penultimate syllable, -tra- [is long] because it is the penultimate syllable in penetrábam (I was penetrating), and -ne- [is short] because it is the penultimate syllable in pénetro (I penetrate); and in collōcūtīōnībus five syllables can be known: for as -ni- is here the penultimate, so -o- is in collocutiōnis, -ti- in collocútio (which is also short by the first rule for first and middle syllables), -cu- in collocútum and -lo- in colloquor.³⁹⁸

[C9r]

Exceptions

³⁹³ i.e. to the normal rules of the first conjugation; so for example the regular present infinitive amāre (to love) and second person singular future simple amābis (you will love) have the stress on the penultimate, long, syllable.

³⁹⁴ To place around; you will give; you will do away with.

³⁹⁵ To stand (first conjugation); to weep (second); to know (fourth).

³⁹⁶ Long-lasting, original, of tomorrow, of the day after tomorrow, this year's, late.

³⁹⁷ Of beech, of olive, of crystal, of steel, red, linen. These will all be stressed on the antepenultimate syllable.

³⁹⁸ Respectively dative/ablative plural, genitive and nominative singular of collocutio (conversation), and nominative/accusative neuter singular perfect participle and first person present indicative of colloquor (I converse).

1. Compounds of facio (I do/make) have their stress on the short a in prose, as benefácis, frigefácit (you do good, s/he makes cold).
2. The syllables -rímus and -rítis of the future perfect,³⁹⁹ which in prose have the stress on the penultimate syllable, in verse have the same syllable either long or short.

Of this kind are the genitives of pronouns having second declension form:⁴⁰⁰ about which see above.

Also pituīta, phrenésis (slime/phlegm, delirium), Neréis, platéa, choréa and conopéum [see above] do not always have the accent on the penultimate.

Horace, Epistles I.1 [108]:

Praecipue sanus, nisi cum pituīta molesta est
(Above all sound in mind, except when he's troubled by snot)

The same, Sermones II, satire 2 [75–6]:

Dulcia se in bilem vertent, stomachoque tumultum
Lenta feret pituīta ...
(Sweet things will turn to bile, and heavy phlegm will bring merry hell to the stomach)

Catullus, to Furius [23.17]:

Mucusque et mala pituīta nasi
(And mucus and any grim snot in the nose)

³⁹⁹ Known at the time as the 'future conjunctive' or 'future subjunctive'.

⁴⁰⁰ Illíus, ipsíus, etc.

Persius, by contrast, shortens the penultimate syllable, but following Catullus lengthens the first.⁴⁰¹

Satires II [58]:

Somnia pituita qui purgatissima mittunt
(Who send dreams that are the most purgative of phlegm);

So Juvenal, Satires XIV [136]:

Quum furor haud dubius, quum sit manifesta phrenēsis
(Since there's no doubt about the madness of it, when the craziness is obvious)

Martial, Book IV, epigram 81.⁴⁰²

Declamas in febre Mathon⁴⁰³ hanc esse phrenēsin
(You declaim in your fever, Maron: [if you do not know] that this is delirium)

Serenus Sammonicus, Liber Medicinalis [I.87]:⁴⁰⁴

Ex vitio cerebri phrenēsis furiosa movetur
(From a defect of the brain a raging frenzy is provoked).

Concerning the remaining four see the first rule for first and middle syllables [above] with the annotations to the same.

⁴⁰¹ Butler seemingly treats the two examples in Horace as scanned 'pītūitā'; Lewis and Short (s.v.) describe them as a trisyllable, 'pītuītā'; likewise in the Persius, Butler scans 'pītūitā', but Lewis and Short 'pītuītā'.

⁴⁰² IV.80.5.

⁴⁰³ Modern editions read Maron.

⁴⁰⁴ Also numbered VII.90.

Compounds of words of number⁴⁰⁵

Second rule for middle syllables

II. Compounds of words of number, of which [C9v] the first, slightly altered, ends in i, have that i as a short middle syllable, as causidicus (advocate), multiplīco (I multiply) (1.).

To these can be added compounds with semi- (half) and sesqui- (one and a half), as semivir, sesquipēs (half-man, a foot and a half); and those which are compounds of numerals, as biceps, triformis, quadriremis,⁴⁰⁶ even when a consontal i follows: as biiugus, quadriiugus (yoked with a pair, yoked with a team of four) (2.); except for quotidie (3.), biduum and triduum (4.),⁴⁰⁷ which can be long or short.

To this group belong also compounds with -lentus and -bundus which have a short vowel before these particles, as opulentus, fremebundus (opulent, growling) (5.)

But a before -bundus is long, as errābundus, sudābundus (wandering, sweaty).

[Notes to the second rule for middle syllables]

1.) So munificus, municeps, armiger, frugifer, altitonans, arcitenens, cornipes, tubicen, coelicola, paricida, amplifico, significo,⁴⁰⁸ and the like. Ausonius however takes the liberty of lengthening matricida (matricide), albeit this word does not apply itself metrically otherwise.⁴⁰⁹

De XII Caesaribus [Monosticha, IV.6]:

⁴⁰⁵ As classified by Ramus, 'voces numeri' were nouns, adjectives, pronouns and participles; and (in a separate category) verbs. From his comment on scilicet and ilicet below, Butler appears to be referring to the former only.

⁴⁰⁶ Two-headed, threefold, a ship with four banks of oars.

⁴⁰⁷ Daily, a period of two days, a period of three days.

⁴⁰⁸ Beneficent, citizen, arms-bearing, fruit-bearing, thundering on high, carrying a bow, hoofed, trumpeter, heaven-dwelling, parricide, I extend, I signify.

⁴⁰⁹ Though cf. Sidonius Apollinaris Carmina, V.290, where it is scanned short.

Matricida Nero proprii vim pertulit ensis

(The matricide Nero submitted to the strength of his own sword)

Joseph Scaliger reads for this word ‘matricida’ (and the matricide), with tmesis. The genitive quantivis (of however great) has a long first I, but here there is no alteration, since it comes from the genitive quantī.

Scīlicet and īlicet (of course, it is over/forthwith) are long, but they are not compounds of words of number.⁴¹⁰

Tibīcen, bīgae, *quadrīgae*⁴¹¹ are long by crasis [or synaeresis, see above].

Likewise meridies (midday), for just as *tibiicen*⁴¹² and in contracted form tibīcen is formed from tibia (a pipe/flute), so medii dies and (with the d turned into r) in contracted form meridies is formed from medius (middle), as is the etymologists’ opinion.

Martial, Book III, epigram 20 [13]:

Inter tepentes post merīdiem buxos

(Among the warmth of the box-bushes in the afternoon)

Prīdie (the day before) and postrīdie (the next day) are also long; but in these there is a certain synaeresis, with several syllables contracted into one: for they are compounded of priori die and postremo die.

[C10r]

2.) Georgics III [91]:

Martis equi bīuges et magni currus Achillis

(The two-horse pair of Mars and of great Achilles’ chariot)

⁴¹⁰ They are compounds of the verbs scio and eo and the impersonal verb licet.

⁴¹¹ Flute-player; a team of two horses; a team of four.

⁴¹² Misprinted as tibicīen.

in the same book [18]:

Centum quadrīugos agitabo ad flumina currus
(I will drive a hundred four-horse chariots by the river)

Aeneid X [253]:

Turrigeraeque urbes bīiugique ad frena leones (Towered cities and lions teamed in pairs in the reins)

in the same [571]:

Quadrīuges in equos adversaque pectora tendit
(At the four-horse team and the men ranged against him)

3.) Martial, Book X, epigram 65 [8]:

Levis dropace tu quōtīdiano
(You with your daily depilatory are smooth)

Martial, Book IV, epigram 37 [9]:

Quōtīdianam refice nauseam nummis
(Cure my daily nausea with coins)

Catullus, to Mallius:⁴¹³

Coniugis in culpa flagravī quōtīdiana
(Burnt with her husband's daily guilt)

⁴¹³ 68.139; but this line has since been amended to read 'Coniugis in culpa flagrantem concoquit iram'.

4.) Biduum and triduum are held to be common [i.e. short or long], since though they are short by nature they are everywhere long in Terence, as:

Andria, Act II [440]:

Non hercle, aut si adeo bīdūi est aut trīdūi
(No by heavens; or if so, it's of two or three days)

The E[u]nuch, Act II [181]:

Ego impetrare nequeo hoc abs te biduum
(I can't get this from you, [to grant me] two days)

And indeed Martial has trīduum long, as:

Book II, epigram 6 [12]:

Si totus tibi trīduo legatur
(If the whole thing takes three days to be read by you)

5. So gracīlētus, sanguinōlētus, vinōlētus, viōlētus, escūlētus, fraudūlētus, lucūlētus, lutūlētus, pulverūlētus, etc.;⁴¹⁴ and gemēbundus, tremēbundus, morībundus, puđībundus, querībundus, etc.⁴¹⁵, although [Baptista] Mantuanus, taking licence for the sake of the metre, says

... quem virūlenta Megaera
Vincere cum toto non evaluisset Averno (Whom poisonous Megaera and all Avernus had not been strong enough to defeat).

⁴¹⁴ Slender, bloody, drunk, violent, good to eat, deceitful, brilliant, muddy, dusty.

⁴¹⁵ Groaning, fearful, dying, ashamed, complaining.

Compounds of facio

Third rule for middle syllables

III. Compounds of facio and fio (I make, I am made/become) and a word of number⁴¹⁶ which, slightly altered, ends in e, have that middle e common, as tepefacio, liquefacio (I warm, I melt).

[C10v]

Catullus, Argonautia, l:⁴¹⁷

Alta tepēfecit permista flumina caede

(He made the deep river run warm with promiscuous slaughter)
the same, to Mallius:⁴¹⁸

Frigida deserto tepēfecit⁴¹⁹ membra cubili
(Warmed his cold limbs in your deserted bed)

Metamorphoses VII [161]:

Thura liquēfaciunt, inductaque cornibus aurum
(Melt incense, and [the victim,] led in with gold on its horns)

Ex Ponto l.2 [55]:

⁴¹⁶ i.e. a noun or adjective; see above.

⁴¹⁷ 64.360. Modern editions read 'tepēfaciet' but still with the long e.

⁴¹⁸ 68.29. Modern editions read 'tepēfactat', still with the short e.

⁴¹⁹ Misprinted 'tapefecit'; corrected in 1629.

Sic mea perpetuis liquēfiunt pectora curis
(So my heart turns to water with endless cares)

Lucretius, I [957]:⁴²⁰

Constet: an immensum patēfiat ad usque profundum ([Whether everything] is [finite]: or whether an immense deep opens up to infinity)

the same, Book IV [345]:

Atque patēfecit, quas ante obsederat ater⁴²¹
(And opened [the ways], which before the dark had blocked)

the same, Book VI [1001]:

Causa patēfiet quae ferri pelliciat vim
(The cause is revealed of attracting the strength of iron)

Prudentius, Apotheosis [761]:

Pristinus in speculum decor excitat et putrēfactus
(Their former glory revives [his eyes] into mirrors, and the decaying)

Lucretius, II [898]:

Et tamen haec cum sunt quasi putrēfacta per imbres
(And yet even these when they have been as it were rotted away by the rains)

⁴²⁰ Modern editions read 'Constet an immensum pateat vasteque profundum'.

⁴²¹ Modern editions read 'aēr'.

although Virgil has them short in all cases:

Georgic IV [36]:

Cogit hyems, eademque calor liquēfacta remittit (Winter solidifies [the honey], and heat melts and liquefies it)

in the same [365]:

Ibat et ingenti motu stupēfactus aquarum
(He went and astonished by the great movement of waters)

Aeneid II [259]:

Laxat claustra Sinon: illos patēfactus ad auras
(Sinon unloosed the bars: [the horse,] opened up, [returned] them to the open air)

Aeneid IV [395]:

Multa gemens, magnoque animum labēfactus amore
(Groaning much and shaken in his spirit by a great love)

Aeneid V [330]:

Fusus humi⁴²² viridesque super madēfecerat herbas (Had been poured and moreover made the ground's green grass wet)

Aeneid IX [333]:

⁴²² Modern editions read 'humum' (Poured out over the ground and made the green grass wet).

Sanguine singultantem atro patēfacta⁴²³ cruore (Sobbing with blood; [the ground] laid open by dark gore)

in the same [106]:

Annuit, et totum nutu tremēfecit Olympum
(He nodded his assent and with the nod set all Olympus atremble)

Aeneid XII [66]:

Subiecit rubor, et calēfacta per ora cucurrit
(A blush kindled [a flame] and ran across her hot face)

THREE SPECIFIC RULES FOR FINAL SYLLABLES

First rule

I. Final syllables ending in a, i and u; c and n;⁴²⁴ -as, -es and -os are long.

Exceptions

These are short:

[C11r]

Ending in a:⁴²⁵

⁴²³ Modern editions read 'tepēfacta' (made warm with), with the same short e.

⁴²⁴ Unintelligibly misprinted as 'a, i, n; o, n;' etc. Correct in 1629 though clearer in 1618.

⁴²⁵ Butler here enumerates 1., 2. etc; which have been omitted for the sake of greater clarity, to avoid confusion with his note cues which are similarly numbered.

ită, quiă, eiă (1., 2.);⁴²⁶ all cases (3.) except vocatives of Greek words in -as and ablatives of the first declension, as ‘o Thomā’ (O Thomas), ‘ab hac musā’ (by this muse);

but numerals (4.) ending in -ginta are common, such as triginta (thirty).

Ending in i:

nișă, quaișă (5.), sicută (6., 7.);⁴²⁷

datives (8.) and vocatives of Greek words, as ‘huic Palladi’ (to this Minerva), ‘o Amarylli’ (O Amaryllis); but *mihi, tibi, sibi, ubi, ibi*⁴²⁸ are common.

Ending in c:

lăc, nēc, donēc;⁴²⁹

but [fac] (do)⁴³⁰ (9.) and the pronoun hic (this, masculine) and its neuter hoc, as long as it is not in the ablative case, are common.

Ending in n:

ăn, forsăn, forsităn;⁴³¹ tamăn with its compounds attamăn, veruntamăn;⁴³² în with its compounds exîn, subîn, deîn, proîn;⁴³³ and those words which are subject to apocope: *măn’, vidăn’, etc.*⁴³⁴ (10.);

⁴²⁶ So, because, ha!/come!

⁴²⁷ Unless, as if, just as.

⁴²⁸ To me, to you, to her/him, where, there.

⁴²⁹ Milk, nor, until.

⁴³⁰ Omitted in error in this printing.

⁴³¹ Whether/or, perhaps, perhaps.

⁴³² However, but nevertheless, but yet.

⁴³³ In/on/against; thereupon, then, thence/then, likewise/hence.

⁴³⁴ For mene (me?), videsne (do you see?).

accusatives in -an from nominatives in -a, as Iphigeniān (11.);

uninflected cases in -en that decline with a short i, as carmĕn [genitive carmĭnis] (song);

accusatives in -in and -yn as Alexĭn, Ityn;⁴³⁵

Greek words in -on with an omicron, as nominative Iliōn (Troy), accusative Caucasōn (the Caucasus).

Ending in -as:

uninflected cases of Greek words that decline with -ad-, as Pallās (12).

Greek accusative plurals of the fifth declension, as craterās, heroās (drinking-cups, heroines).

Ending in -es:

penēs (in the possession/presence of), and ēs (you are) with its compounds, such as potēs, prodēs (you are able, you are profitable);

uninflected cases of words that decline with a short i or e, as milēs, praepēs (13.) (soldier, fast flying/bird; genitives milĭtis, praepĕtis), except ariēs, abiēs, pariēs, Cerēs and pēs (14.) with its compounds such as sonipēs, quadrupēs;⁴³⁶

Greek neuters and nominative plurals, such as Hippomanēs (15.), Cyclopēs.

[C11v]

Ending in -os:

compōs, impōs, and ōs (genitive ossis);⁴³⁷

Greek words with an omicron, as nominative Chaōs, genitive Palladōs (of Minerva).

[Notes to the first rule of final syllables and its exceptions]

⁴³⁵ Accusative of Alexis, Itys.

⁴³⁶ Ram, fir, wall, Ceres, foot, noisy-footed/horse, four-footed.

⁴³⁷ Having the mastery of, not having the mastery of, bone.

1.) Valerius Flaccus, [Argonautica] VIII [110]:

Ferret ad aurigerae caput arboris, eiă per ipsum (Might bring [himself] to the top of the gold-bearing tree; Ho! [he said] by that one)

Buchanan, Psalm 147 [23]:

Eiă Dei laudes Solymaeae pangite tures
(Come sing God's praises, you towers of Jerusalem)

2.) [Johannes] Despauterius⁴³⁸ and Aldus [Minutius] add pută when it is used in place of videlicet (for instance),⁴³⁹ citing this verse:

Persius, Satires IV [9]:

Hoc pută non iustum est, illud male, rectius illud (This, for instance, is unjust; that is bad; this is more just) but many codices, and even the readings of the Aldine edition, read 'puto' (I think) for 'puta'.

Postea (afterwards), too, is always short in Ovid, as:

Fasti I [165]:

Posteă mirabar cur non sine litibus esset
(After this I wondered why [the day] was not without law-suits)

Fasti II [555]:

Posteă praeteriti tumulis redduntur honores

⁴³⁸ c.1480 – 1520, Flemish grammarian.

⁴³⁹ i.e. when it is used parenthetically.

(Afterwards honour that had been neglected was given the tombs) but they maintain that this should be read as separate words, ‘post eă’; for the compounds like it, antea, interea, praeterea and *propterea*⁴⁴⁰ are always long, as:

Catullus 4 [10]:

Ubi iste post phaselus anteā fuit

(Where she, afterwards a boat, was previously [a leafy wood]).

Posteāquam (after), however, a compound of postea, is short:

Victor,⁴⁴¹ [Commentarii in Genesin II.412]

Posteāquam rursus speculatrix arva patere

(After the lookout again reported countryside lying clear).

Contra (against/on the contrary) too is [sometimes] read short, as:

Lucretius, I [466]:

Ne forte haec per se cogant nos contrā fateri

(Lest by chance they force us on the contrary to admit these things by themselves)

Manilius, II [253]:

Contrā⁴⁴² iacet Cancer patulam distentus in alvum

⁴⁴⁰ Before, meanwhile, besides, therefore.

⁴⁴¹ Claudius Marius Victor, Victorius or Victorinus, of Masillia, fifth century.

⁴⁴² The MSS are not in agreement. Bentley suggested ‘Strata iacent’; modern editions read ‘Quaeve iacent’.

(Cancer by contrast lies spread out with distended belly;

but these seem to be liberties, since elsewhere it is always long, even with Lucretius himself, as:

I [366]:

At contrā gravior plus in se corporis esse

(But by contrast the heavier thing [shows] there to be more body in it) as a result Aldus reads for the earlier line [1.466], ‘Ne contra haec⁴⁴³ per se cogant nos forte fateri’ and [Dionysius] Lambinus⁴⁴⁴ ‘Ne forte haec per se cogant nos esse fateri’.⁴⁴⁵

3.) Certain nominatives of Greek proper nouns are now and then scanned long, in the Greek manner, as:

Thebaid IV [159]:

Dat Nemeā comites, et quas in proelia vires

(Nemea supplies comrades, and what force [they are gathering] for battles)

in the same book [224]:

Quos Pylos, et dubiis Maleā vitata carinis

(Whom Pylos and Malea, avoided by nervous ships)

Heroides 14 [1]:

⁴⁴³ Contra is thus elided.

⁴⁴⁴ Denis Lambin (1520 – 1572), classical scholar.

⁴⁴⁵ A reading that is now generally accepted.

Mittit Hypermnestrā de tot modo fratribus uni
(Hypermnestra sends this to one only out of so many brothers)

Prudentius, Enchiridion:⁴⁴⁶

Implebit Mariā, Christum paries sacra virgo
([The Holy Spirit] will fill you, Mary, and you, holy virgin, will bear Christ)

[C12r]

4.) There are those who say that numerals in -ginta are long only; but they are also read short, as:

Martial, III.40 [1]:⁴⁴⁷

Mutua quod nobis ter quinquagintā dedisti
(Because you gave me thrice fifty as a loan)

Martial, XII.26 [1]:⁴⁴⁸

Sexagintā teras cum limina mane senator
(Since you, a senator, wear out sixty doorsteps a morning)

Ausonius, Epistles [16.5]:

Nonagintā dies sine te, charissime, traxi
(I have endured ninety long days without you, dearest friend)

⁴⁴⁶ Dittochaeon 25.100.

⁴⁴⁷ Also numbered III.41.1. Modern editions read 'quinguagenă'.

⁴⁴⁸ Also numbered XII.29.1. Modern editions read 'sexagenă'.

Juvencus, [Evangeliorum,] II [171]:

Hoc aiunt: vix sex et quadragintă per annos
(This they say: in scarce six and forty years)

Manilius, II [322]:⁴⁴⁹

Ter trigintă quadrum partes per sidera reddant
(Ninety [degrees] give the sides of a square formed by the stars).

5.) Lucretius has quasi (as if) long, as II [291]:

Et devicta quasī cogatur ferre patique
(And, as it were defeated, is forced to endure and suffer) but not without poetic licence. For elsewhere it is short, as:

in the same book [69]:

Et quasī longinquo fluere omnia cernimus aevo
(And we see all things as it were flow away with the long ages)

in the same book [79]:

Et quasī cursores vitae lampada tradunt
(And like runners hand on the lamps of life).

6.) Lucretius, II [536]:

⁴⁴⁹ Modern editions mark 'Ter triginta' as corrupt, or read 'Ter denae quadrum', scanning the a of 'quadrum' long.

Sicutī quadrupedum⁴⁵⁰ cum primis esse videmus
(As we see is the case with the first among quadrupeds)

7.) To which add cui (to whom/which) as a disyllable:

Martial, XI.73:⁴⁵¹

Collatus cūī gallus est Priapus
(Compared to whom Priapus is a eunuch of Cybele)

Martial, XII.49 [3]:

Et credit cūī Posthumilla dives
(And to whom wealthy Postumilla entrusts)

8.) Datives of Greek words of the fifth declension, as also nominative⁴⁵² plurals, are sometimes long: to wit those that have the same form as the Latin third declension, according to which they are also usually inflected.⁴⁵³

Heroides 13 [73a]:⁴⁵⁴

Ut rapiat Paridī, quam Paris ante sibi
(That he may seize back from Paris the one whom Paris before stole from him)

Metamorphoses V [280]:

⁴⁵⁰ Modern editions read 'Sicut quadrupedum'.

⁴⁵¹ XI.72.2.

⁴⁵² Misprinted 'noni-nativi'.

⁴⁵³ Misprinted 'inflect[i]'.

⁴⁵⁴ Held by some to be a spurious insertion, though Housman thought it genuine (A.E. Housman, 'Ovid's Heroides', The Classical Review, vol. 11, no. 4 (1897), p. 201).

Maeonidēs (agnorat⁴⁵⁵ enim) consistite dixit

(‘Women of Maeonia’, he said (for he had recognised them), ‘hold still’)

But nouns of the Latin third declension which in Greek were of the first declension always have a long vowel in the dative as if they were Latin, as Orestī, Euripidī, Pyladī.⁴⁵⁶

9.) Ovid, Ars Amatoria I [225]:

Hos fāc⁴⁵⁷ Armenios, haec est Danaïa Persis

(Make these ones Armenians, this is Persia, Danae’s descendant)

Heroides 2 [98]:

Phylli fāc expectes Demophoonta tuum

(Phyllis, be sure to wait for your Demophoon)

10.) Aeneid VI [779]:

Educet[:] vidēn’ ut geminae stant vertice cristae

(Will bear: see how twin crests stand on his head)

[C12v]

Heroides 12 [71]:

Nostīn’⁴⁵⁸ an exciderunt mecum loca? venimus ambo

⁴⁵⁵ Modern editions read ‘Mnemonides (cognorat ...)’.

⁴⁵⁶ Datives of Orestes, Euripides, Pylades.

⁴⁵⁷ But modern editions read ‘facito’, with similar meaning.

⁴⁵⁸ Modern editions read ‘Noscis ... venimus illuc’.

(Do you know, or has the place as well as me dropped out of your memory ? We both came).

But because these contradict this:

Sermones I, satire 1 [108]:

Istuc, unde abii, redeo: nemon' ut avarus⁴⁵⁹

(I return to where I left off: does no one, being greedy)

and Aeneid I [617]:

Tun' ille Aeneas, quem Dardanio Anchisae

(Are you that Aeneas, whom to Trojan Anchises),

the most approved versions do not have apocope in these cases.⁴⁶⁰

11.) For those that come from nominatives in -as are long, as Aeneān.

12.) Since the goddess Pallas (Minerva) has her genitive in -ados, the final syllable [of the nominative] is short; but Pallās, [genitive] Pallantos⁴⁶¹ is long, according to the specific rule, as:

Aeneid VIII [466]:

Filius huic Pallās, olli comes ibat Achates

(His son Pallas went as companion with the one, Achates with the other)

⁴⁵⁹ But modern editions read 'Illuc, unde abii, redeo, qui nemo, ut avarus'.

⁴⁶⁰ In other words read 'nemone ut' and 'Tune Aeneas', with elision. Modern editions read the latter.

⁴⁶¹ The name of several mythical and historical characters.

13.) Praepes is said to come from praepetendo: according to the etymologists,⁴⁶² as if seeking diligently (petens) for places over (prae) those that are less⁴⁶³ dangerous: which the genitive ending in -petis argues for, and not in -pedis like compounds of pes. But the final syllable is short, as:

Aeneid V [254–5]:

... quem praepēs ab Ida
sublimem pedibus rapuit Iovis armiger uncis (... whom the bird, Jupiter's arms-bearer, seized high up on Ida with taloned feet);

but somehow it has crept in among the compounds of pes and comes to be said to have a long final syllable.

14.) Georgics III [55]:

Pēs etiam: et camuris hirtae sub cornibus aures
(Her foot, too, and hairy ears under curved-back horns)

Aeneid IV [135]:

Stat sonipēs ac fraena ferox spumantia mandit
(The noisy-footed horse stands and champs fiercely on the foaming bit)

Aeneid X [892]:

Tollit se arrectum quadrupēs et calcibus auras
(The four-footed beast reared up high and [lashed] at the air with his hooves)

Sermones I, satire 3 [13]:

⁴⁶² Lewis and Short (s.v. praepes A) quote Festus at length, who gives a number of theories; but themselves give praepeto as the origin.

⁴⁶³ Presumably he means 'more'.

Omnia magna loquens: modo, sit mihi mensa tripēs et (Talking of everything great; now it's, Let me have a three-footed table and);

but later writers shorten the compounds, as:

Ausonius, Edyllia:⁴⁶⁴

Qui bipēs⁴⁶⁵ et quadrupes foret, et tripēs omnia solus
(What one thing was two-footed, and four-footed, and three-footed, all these)

Prudentius, Apotheosis [212]:

Non recipit natura hominis modo quadrupēs ille
(The nature of man does not allow; so long as he [is not] four-footed) just as they shorten compounds of par (equal): see note 9 in the notes for the second [specific] rule [for final syllables].

15.) For in Greek it is written with an epsilon;⁴⁶⁶ but nominative plurals are sometimes long. See note 8 above.

[D1r]

Second rule of final syllables

II. Final syllables ending in e; b and d (1.); l, r and t; -is, -us and -ys (2.) are short (3.).

[Notes to the second rule of final syllables]

⁴⁶⁴ Griphus Ternarii Numeri, 39.

⁴⁶⁵ Misprinted as 'tripēs'.

⁴⁶⁶ The Greek short e (ε).

1.) Hebrew words ending in b and d are long: as lob, Iacob, Bogud, David; whose oblique⁴⁶⁷ cases also have a long penultimate syllable in Juvencus, as:

[Evangeliorium,] I [149]:

Urbs est Iudaeae Bethleēm, Davīda canorum
(There is a city of Judea, Bethlehaem, [which bore] melodious David)

in the same [166]:

Nam genitus puer est Davīdis origine clara (For a boy was born of David's famous line);

but this, because it is written in Hebrew with a small hiriq, Buchanan always shortens, as:

Psalm 89 [44]:

Davīdis et sacro perfudi tempora olivo
(And I have anointed David's temples with holy oil)

2.) Tethys, in Virgil, reads with a long final syllable.

Georgics I [31]:

Teque sibi generum Tethys emat omnibus undis
(And Tethys with all her waters gains you as a son-in-law)

But -ys is not for that reason [generally] long, any more than -ān (accusative) from (Greek) -a is [just] because Ovid says:

⁴⁶⁷ i.e. inflected.

Tristia II [395]:

Qui legis Electrān, et egentem mentis Orestem (You who read of Electra and Orestes going out of his mind);

for in both places it is a matter of diastole.

3.) Moreover the Greek vowel y is short [at the end of a word], as:

Metamorphoses XIV [292]:

Molŷ vocant superi: nigra radice tenetur
(The gods call it moly; it is held on a black root)

Tristia IV [3.77]:

Ars tua, Tiphŷ, iacet,⁴⁶⁸ si non sit in aequore fluctus (Your skill, Tiphys, is useless, if there is no swell in the sea);

also -m, when not elided, is short: see [above] on omitted ecthlipsis, and the notes on the first rule for first syllables.

[D1v]

Exceptions

The following are long:

Ending in e:⁴⁶⁹

⁴⁶⁸ Some editions adopt Heinsius' 'vacet'.

⁴⁶⁹ Again, Butler's enumeration has been omitted for the sake of clarity.

Monosyllables, as mē, dē, sē,⁴⁷⁰ except for the enclitic conjunctions -quě, -ně, -vě,⁴⁷¹ the prepositional prefix rě-,⁴⁷² and the strengthening particles -cě, -tě, -ptě (1.)

Ablatives of the fifth declension, as rē, diē (from res, thing/matter, dies, day), along with adverbs derived from them such as hodiē, quotidiē, pridiē, postridiē, quarē,⁴⁷³ and the impersonal verb rēfert (it is of advantage) (2.).

Second person singular active imperatives of the second conjugation, such as docē (learn) (3.).

Adverbs formed from adjectives of the second declension type, such as minimē (least of all) and validē and by syncope valdē (strongly/very); also fermē and ferē (nearly/generally) (4.) and ohē (ho there!); but not beně and malě (well, badly).

Greek words with eta,⁴⁷⁴ such as nominative Lethē, vocative Anchisē (O Anchises).

Ending in l:

Sol (sun) (5., 6.) and certain Hebrew words such as Baāl, Michaël (7.)

Ending in r:

The following monosyllables: fār, lār, fūr, cūr, Nār and vēr,⁴⁷⁵ and pār with its compounds compār, impār, dispār (8., 9.).⁴⁷⁶

Greek words with eta, as aēr, aethēr, cratēr; but not patēr and matēr.⁴⁷⁷

[D2r]

Ending in -is:

⁴⁷⁰ Me, concerning/of, her/himself.

⁴⁷¹ And, interrogative particle, or.

⁴⁷² Lewis and Short (s.v. re) call this an inseparable particle that does not appear except in compound verbs, and give no examples of its appearing in tmesis.

⁴⁷³ Today, every day, the day before, the day after, wherefore.

⁴⁷⁴ The Greek long e (η).

⁴⁷⁵ Spelt, house/household god, thief, why, the River Nar (Nera, a tributary of the Tiber), spring. 'nar' is misprinted in lower case.

⁴⁷⁶ Equal, equal, unequal, unlike.

⁴⁷⁷ Air, ether, drinking vessel, father, mother.

Monosyllables, such as līs, vīs and its compounds quamvīs, quidvīs etc.; but not īs, quīs and bīs (10.).⁴⁷⁸

Uninflected words that decline in a long i, as Samnīs, genitive Samnītis (a Samnite), Salamīs, genitive Salamīnis.

Oblique cases in the plural, as musīs (dative or ablative of musa, a muse).

Second person singulars, of which the [second person] plurals end in -ītis with a long penultimate syllable, as audīs, velīs, the future [perfect] dederīs,⁴⁷⁹ whose plurals are audītis, velītis, dederītis (11.).

Greek words in -ois, as Symoīs, Pyroīs.

Ending in -us:

Monosyllables, as sūs, plūs (pig, more).

Uninflected words that decline in a long u, as virtūs (virtue, genitive virtūtis).

All cases of the fourth declension except nominative and vocative singulars.

Greek words ending in -ous,⁴⁸⁰ as 'hic Panthūs' (this Panthus), 'huius Cl[i]ūs'⁴⁸¹ (of this Clio); except for compounds of pous (foot), such as polypūs (octopus/polyp).

[Notes to the exceptions to the second rule of final syllables]

1.) As in hiscē, tutē, tuoptē,⁴⁸² and the like.

2.) Fame in the ablative is also customarily long, since fames (hunger) was in previous times of the fifth declension, as:

Lucretius, III [732]:

Sollicitae volitant morbis, algoque famēque

⁴⁷⁸ Lawsuit, you will, how you will, what you will; he, who?, twice.

⁴⁷⁹ You hear, you wish (subjunctive), you will have given.

⁴⁸⁰ i.e. -oos in Greek, written -ous or sometimes -ūs in Latin.

⁴⁸¹ Misprinted 'Clūs' in 1621 (and 1618); corrected in 1629.

⁴⁸² These (dative/ablative plural), you, your (dative/ablative); all emphatic.

(They fly to and fro, [not] troubled by sickness and cold and hunger)

Georgics IV [318]:

Amissis, ut fama, apibus morboque famēque

(Having lost, as the story goes, his bees to sickness and famine)

Metamorphoses VIII [843]:

Iamque famē patrias altique voragine ventris

(And now by hunger and his belly's deep abyss [had eaten away] his inherited [wealth])

Martial, Book I, epigram 100.⁴⁸³

Hoc si contigerit, famē peribis

(If this happens, you will die of hunger)

Tibullus, I.5 [53]:

Ipsa famē stimulante furens herbasque sepulchris

(Spurred on by hunger, in her madness she seeks out grass on the graves)

[D2v]

3.) Cavē (beware) is sometimes found short, see [above, on] systole.

Vidēs and valēdico (see/take care, I bid farewell) are short: see [above,] the third exception for compound words.

4.) Aeneid III [135]:

⁴⁸³ l.99.18.

lamque ferē sicco subductae litore puppes
(And now the ships were for the most part drawn up on the dry beach);

but in Ausonius it is short:

Epigrams 103:⁴⁸⁴

Nam tecum ferē totus ero, quocunque recedam
(For I will be altogether with you; and wherever I go)

5.) Georgics I [232]:

Per duodena regit mundi Sōl aureus astra
(Through the twelve constellations of the universe the Golden sun rules)

Tristia, IV.6:⁴⁸⁵

Bis me sōl adiit gelidae post tempora⁴⁸⁶ brumae
(Twice has the sun come to me after the times of frozen winter)

6.) Aldus adds Pol, how rightly is his business. For when it is an adverbial oath, for ‘by Pollux’, as aedepol for ‘aedem Pollucis’ (by the temple of Pollux), we find it rather to be short, since Πολυδέυκης (Poludéukēs), from which ‘Pollux’ comes, is written with an omicron; to which Ennius assents:

Annales I.94:⁴⁸⁷

⁴⁸⁴ Pseudo-Ausonius, Galla, 5.

⁴⁸⁵ IV.7.1.

⁴⁸⁶ Modern editions read ‘frigora’ (chills).

⁴⁸⁷ In Macrobius, Saturnalia 6.1.

Nec pŏl homo quisquam faciet impune animatus
(Nor, by Pollux, will any man alive do this with impunity).

Nīl is lengthened by synaeresis: see the third rule for all syllables.

7.) So Gabriēl, Daniēl, Raphaēl, Israēl, Micōl, Phicōl, etc.

8.) Sermones II, satire 3 [248]:

Ludere pār impār, equitare in arundine longa
(To play at even and odd, to ride on a long hobby-horse)

But, just as the compounds are long in accordance with the uncompounded word, so are they also shortened by later writers according to the rule, as:

Prudentius, Contra Orationem Symmachi [168]:

Succumbit Phrygio, coitus fuit impār utrique (Submits to a Trojan: the match was unequal for both) the same, Hamartigenia [26]:

Quidquid dispār habet cumulum discretio carpit
(Whatever a different one has; the difference detracts from the whole).

The same happens with compounds of pes.

9.) Ovid lengthens vir (man) and cor (heart), as:

[D3r]

Metamorphoses I [660]:

De grege nunc tibi vir, et de grege natus habendus⁴⁸⁸

(Now you must have a husband from the herd, and a son from the herd too)

Heroides 21:⁴⁸⁹

Molle meum levibus cōr est violabile telis⁴⁹⁰

(My soft heart is vulnerable to light weapons)

but in both cases he does so with licence: see [above, on] diastole. For elsewhere it is short, as:

Aeneid VI [791]:

Hic vīr, hic est, tibi quem promitti saepius audis

(Here is the man, this is he, who you often hear is promised)

Tristia V [8.28]:

Molle cōr ad timidas sic habet ille preces

(He has a soft heart like this for fearful entreaties)

10. Bis is derived by antithesis from δίζ (dis) which is short, and so is short also, as:

Martial, Book I, epigram 45:⁴⁹¹

Et bīs idem facimus nimium si, Stella, videtur

(And we do the same thing twice: if, Stella, it seems [so to you])

⁴⁸⁸ But modern editions read 'De grege nunc tibi vir, nunc de grege natus habendus', meaning vir is long by position (since followed by a consonant) not by nature.

⁴⁸⁹ In fact, 15.79.

⁴⁹⁰ As noted above, modern editions read 'levibusque cōr'.

⁴⁹¹ I.44.3.

Propertius, Book⁴⁹² III, elegy 1 [32]:

Troia bis Oetei numine capta dei
(Troy, twice captured by the power of the god of Oeta⁴⁹³)

Metamorphoses XIV [386]:

Tum bis ad occasus, bis se convertit ad ortus
(Then twice she turned to west, and twice to east)

Ausonius, Epitaphia 33:⁴⁹⁴

Laeta bis octono tibi iam sub consule pubes (Joyful youth, now coming to its sixteenth year for you), although the grammarians, who give quis and is as exceptions to monosyllables being long, omit bis.

11. But possis (you can, subjunctive) is short once in Juvenal:

Satires V [10]:

Tam ieiuna fames? cum possis⁴⁹⁵ honestius illic
(Is your hunger so great? When you can more honourably [shiver] there), ⁴⁹² 'El[egia]', misprinted for '[i]ber'.

⁴⁹³ i.e. Hercules.

⁴⁹⁴ Book XIX, Epigrammata 62.1 in the Loeb Ausonius.

⁴⁹⁵ The MS tradition is in disagreement; some modern editions read 'possit', though 'possis' perhaps makes better sense.

but Despauterius argues that ‘poscis’ (you may beg) should be the reading here, and Stephanus⁴⁹⁶ ‘possit’ (a man may). Should the genuine reading be preserved [in ‘possis’], you may recognise systole here, as above in the adverb contra.

Third rule for final syllables

III. Final o is common (either long or short), as sermo, amo, amando, porro.⁴⁹⁷

[D3v]

Exceptions

Having a long final o:⁴⁹⁸

Monosyllables, as prō, stō (for/on behalf of, I stand); also ergō to mean ‘on account of’.⁴⁹⁹

Datives and ablatives, as ‘huic dominō’ (to this lord), ‘ab hoc servō’⁵⁰⁰ (by this slave).

Adverbs derived from adjectives, as tantō, liquidō (by so much, clearly); eō (there/therefore) and its compounds ideō, adeō (therefore, to such an extent); but not sedulo, mutuo, crebro and *sero*⁵⁰¹ which may all be long or short.

Greek words with an omega,⁵⁰² as lō (1.),⁵⁰³ Sapphō and Didō (feminine nominatives⁵⁰⁴); Androgeō and Apollō (genitive of Androgeos and Apollo⁵⁰⁵); Athō and Apollō (accusatives of Athos and Apollo).

⁴⁹⁶ Robert Estienne (Robertus Stephanus, 1503 – 1559).

⁴⁹⁷ Talk, I love, by loving, forward/furthermore.

⁴⁹⁸ Again, Butler’s enumeration has been omitted for the sake of clarity.

⁴⁹⁹ According to Lewis and Short (s.v.) ergo (on account of/therefore) is sometimes scanned short in the final syllable in Ovid and the post-Augustan poets but no correlation with meaning is suggested, and Butler, unusually for him, does not elaborate with examples.

⁵⁰⁰ Misprinted as ‘servō’.

⁵⁰¹ Eagerly/attentively, in return, often, late.

⁵⁰² The Greek long o (ω).

⁵⁰³ The note cue omitted in error in 1621, supplied from 1618.

⁵⁰⁴ As elsewhere Butler uses a part of hic, haec, hoc (this) to show the case and gender.

⁵⁰⁵ A sufficiently rare form even in Greek; likewise the accusative Apollō.

Sciō, nesciō, citō, illicō and *quomodō*⁵⁰⁶ are short; modo, quoque, ambo, duo, ego and homo are generally⁵⁰⁷ short.

[Notes to the third rule for final syllables and its exceptions]

1.) Both the proper noun (Io) and the adverb (io, hurrah); but the former has a long first syllable, the latter a short.

2.) Not always, since there are also examples where they are long, as:

Catullus, to Varus⁵⁰⁸ [22.12]:

Hoc quid putemus esse? qui modō scurra
(What are we to think of this? The man who just now [seemed] urbane)

Victorinus, De Fratibus Machabeis [231]:⁵⁰⁹

Ulla potest decreta modō tu vive superstes⁵¹⁰
([Nor] can any [power change] what is decreed, only, live, a survivor)

Eclogues VII [4]:

Ambō florentes aetatibus, Arcades ambo
(Both in the flower of youth, Arcadians both)

Ausonius, Epistles XIX:⁵¹¹

⁵⁰⁶ I know, I know not, quickly, there and then, how.

⁵⁰⁷ Just/only, also, both, two, I, man.

⁵⁰⁸ Misprinted 'Varrus', correct in 1618.

⁵⁰⁹ Formerly attributed to G. Marius Victorinus Afer, but the attribution is not considered plausible.

⁵¹⁰ But Michel Maittaire (Corpus Omnium Veterum Poetarum Latinorum ..., vol. 2 (London, 1721), p. 1562), treats 'modo' as an ablative, agreeing with 'hoc' in the previous line ('in this way'), and punctuates with a colon after it.

⁵¹¹ XXIII in the Loeb Ausonius; the second poem, line 1.

Europamque, Asiamque duō vel maxima terrae (Europe and Asia, indeed the greatest two of earth's [members])

Virgil, De Diris.⁵¹²

Ausus egō primus castos violare pudores
(I first dared to breach her chaste modesty)

Ausonius, Epitaphia, on Croesus.⁵¹³

Sicut egō solus, me quoque pauperior
(Like me [you are] alone, and poorer than I)

[D4r]

Ausonius, [Epigrammata,] to Galla:⁵¹⁴

Separor unus egō, sed partem sumo minorem
(I, one man, am divided: but I take the lesser part)

Ennius, [Annales, 363]:

Unus homō nobis cunctando restituit rem
(One man by delaying restored the state for us)

⁵¹² Lydia 53 in the Appendix Vergiliana. Modern editions read 'egon', making a question (as well as justifying the long o) of it: 'Was I the first ...?'

⁵¹³ This is line 6 of an epitaph beginning 'Effigiem rex Croese tuam ditissime regum', of which modern editions print a different version (numbered VI.30 in the Loeb Ausonius) after the first two lines; the remainder of the version of the poem quoted by Butler is no longer thought authentic to Ausonius.

⁵¹⁴ An epigram 'Vado sed sine me, quia te sine: nec nisi tecum', also no longer considered part of the Ausonius canon (printed in the Oxford Book of Latin Verse (1912) as Pseudo-Ausonius).

The quantities of such syllables as cannot be learned from these rules should be considered with reference to the authority and examples of the poets.

A foot⁵¹⁵ is a disyllable, or a trisyllable, and both may be simple, or mixed.

The simple disyllabic foot is:

A pyrrhic, of two short syllables, as Děŭs (God) or

A spondee, of two longs, as Mūsās (the Muses, accusative).

The mixed disyllabic foot is:

An iamb, of a short and a long, as děōs (the gods, accusative) or

A choreus,⁵¹⁶ of a long and a short, as ārmă (arms).⁵¹⁷

The simple trisyllabic foot is:

A trochee,⁵¹⁸ of three short syllables, as lěgěrě (to gather/read) or

A molossus, of three long syllables, as vīrtūtēs (virtues).

The mixed trisyllabic foot is:

A dactyl, of a long and two shorts, as dīcěrě (to say) or

An anapaest of two shorts and a long, as flŭvīōs (rivers, accusative).

⁵¹⁵ Butler here picks up the argument from B11v, line 2, only to launch immediately into a second digression on the types of metrical feet, which lasts till the end of chapter 14, on D8r.

⁵¹⁶ For which ‘trochee’ was used in later Latin; Butler adds in the margin ‘Commonly called a trochee’.

⁵¹⁷ The opening word of Virgil’s Aeneid.

⁵¹⁸ In the margin, ‘Commonly called a tribrach’.

There are also other trisyllabic feet, and even tetrasyllabic, pentasyllabic and hexasyllabic, which the curiosity, busy indeed, of the grammarians devised: but for our purpose these can suffice. Since however there is so often mention of them in the authors, it would do no harm⁵¹⁹ to add the trisyllables and tetrasyllables here too.

[D4v]

In all there are eight trisyllables;

Four therefore remain:

The bacchic, as ĕgĕstās (want)

The palimbacchic,⁵²⁰ as pōrtā[r]ĕ (to carry)

The amphibrach, as bĕnīgnūs (benign)

The amphimacer,⁵²¹ as vĕrbĕrās (you whip).

There are sixteen tetrasyllables:

The proceleusmatic, as rĕlēgĕrĕ (to reread/sail over again)

The dispondeo, as ōrātōrēs (orators)

The first paeon,⁵²² as āmbrosiūs (divine)

The second paeon, as sŭpĕrbĭā (pride)

The third paeon, as sŭpĕrārĕ (to overcome)

The fourth paeon, as cĕlĕritās (speed)

The first epitrite,⁵²³ as sācĕrdōtēs (priests)

The second epitrite, as cōmprōbārŭnt (they approved/confirmed)

⁵¹⁹ ‘non pigebat’, lit. ‘there was no shame in’.

⁵²⁰ Or antibacchic.

⁵²¹ Or cretic.

⁵²² A paeon is one long and three shorts, ‘first’, ‘second’ etc. denoting the position of the long.

⁵²³ Conversely an epitrite is one short and three longs, with the same system of numbering.

The third epitrite, as cōncōrdīāe (concord)

The fourth epitrite, as cōntēplātōr (contemplator)

The greater ionic, as sāltābīmūs (we will dance)

The lesser ionic, as Lăcēdāemōn (a Spartan)

The choriamb, as prōspērītās (prosperity)

The iambochoreus,⁵²⁴ as Ālēxāndēr

The dichoreus, as cāntīlēnă (old song)

The diamb,⁵²⁵ as āmōenītās (loveliness).

But these tetrasyllables, like the pentasyllables and hexasyllables also, are more correctly called διποδίαι (dipodiai, dipodies or double feet)⁵²⁶ or συζυγίαι (suzugiai, syzygies or couplings) of feet, than feet [in their own right]. For what else is a proceleusmatic than a double pyrrhic? Or what is a dispondeus, dichoreus [D5r] or diamb, than two spondees, chorei, or iambs? As indeed their names indicate. And is the first paeon not the same as a choreus and a pyrrhic? The second, as an iamb and a pyrrhic? The third, as a pyrrhic and a choreus? The fourth as pyrrhic and an iamb? And so on for the others.

The pentasyllabic feet number thirty-two, and the hexasyllabic sixty-four, and I leave them out both on grounds of excessive tedium and as being of no use.

The genera of metre are many: for the rhythm can be varied and shaped in an almost infinite number of ways. But in sum there are two: simple and compound.

A simple metre is that which has one dipody; and it is a dimeter or trimeter.

⁵²⁴ Or iambantidactylus. Both terms are vanishingly rare.

⁵²⁵ Or diiamb.

⁵²⁶ In the margin, 'dipodia, i.e. double feet'.

An ADONIC is a dimeter, consisting of a dactyl and a spondee, as fūlmīnă mōntēs.⁵²⁷

There are glyconic and pherecratic trimeters:

A GLYCONIC consists of a spondee and two dactyls, as Maēcēnās, ēquītūm dēcūs.⁵²⁸

A PHERECRATIC of a spondee, a dactyl and a spondee, as Lātōnāmquē sūprēmō.⁵²⁹

A poem in compound metre is one in which there are a number of dipodies, as a tetrameter or a polymeter.

An ASCLEPIAD is a tetrameter, formed from a molossus and an anapaest⁵³⁰ and two dactyls. [Horace,] Odes IV.8 [25–8]:

Ērēptūm Stŷgīis flūctībŷs Āēācŷm

Virtus, et favor, et lingua potentium

Vatum, divitibus consecrat insulis:

Dignum laude virum Musa vetat mori

(The worth and inclination and tongue of bards of power elevates Aeacus, snatched from the streams of Styx, to the gods in the blessed isles: the muse does not allow a man worthy of praise to die) in which it will be seen how the anapaest ends a word. Sometimes to three asclepiads, a glyconic is added: [Horace,] Odes, III.16 [17–20]:

⁵²⁷ ‘Lightning [strikes] the mountains’: Horace, Odes II.10.12, though modern editions tend to read ‘fulgura montis’. NB that Butler’s approach to the final syllables of lines is to treat them as long or short according to his stated scheme, whereas modern teachers would generally designate them as long or anceps. I have marked them long or short according to Butler’s use. Butler often only provides scansion for part of lines quoted, trusting his readers to take the rest as read; in places I have supplied the missing scansion for the sake of clearer comprehension.

⁵²⁸ ‘Maecenas, glory of the order of knights’: Horace, Odes III.16.20.

⁵²⁹ ‘Latona, [beloved of Jupiter] the highest’: Horace, Odes I.21.3.

⁵³⁰ Marginal note (cut off in the Folger/EEBO copy of 1621, supplied from 1618): ‘commonly described as a spondee, a dactyl and a long syllable’ (i.e. rather than a molossus and an anapaest; the two dactyls follow). As with his description of the elegiac pentameter below, Butler’s account seems rather contrary and has not been followed by posterity, which has gone with the version given in the marginal note.

Crēscētēm sēquītūr cūrā pēcūniām

[D5v] Maiorumque fames: lure perhorui

Late conspicuum tollere verticem,

Maēcēnās, ēquītūm dēcūs.

(Care, and hunger for more comes with growing wealth: rightly did I have a horror of raising my head to be seen far and wide, Maecenas, glory of the order of knights.)

Sometimes two asclepiads and a glyconic are separated by a pherecratic. [Horace,] Odes I.21 [1–4]:

Dīānām tēnērāe dīcītē vīrgīnēs,

Intonsum pueri dicite Cynthium

Lātōnāmquē sūprēmō

Dīlēctām pēnītūs lōvī

(Tender maidens, sing of Diana, boys, sing of Apollo, his hair uncut, and Latona, deeply beloved of Jupiter the highest)

Pentameters and hexameters are polymeters.

There are phalaecian,⁵³¹ sapphic and elegiac pentameters.

A PHALAECIAN consists of a spondee, a dactyl, and three chorei.⁵³² Martial, Book X, epigram 47:

Vītām quāe faciūnt⁵³³ bēātīōrēm, lucundissime Martialis, haec sunt:

Res non parta labore, sed relictā;

Non ingratus ager, focus perennis;

Lis nunquam, toga rara, mens quieta;

⁵³¹ Or phalaecian. Phalaecian and sapphic are two types of hendecasyllables (with eleven syllables to a line).

⁵³² But the final syllable may be scanned long, as in the second line of the Martial quotation.

⁵³³ Modern editions read ‘faciant’.

Vires ingenuae, salubre corpus;
Prudens simplicitas, pares amici;
Convictus facilis, sine arte mensa;
Nox non ebria, sed soluta curis;
Non tristis torus, attamen pudicus;
Somnus qui faciat breves tenebras:
Quod sis esse velis, nihilque malis;
Summum nec metuas diem, nec optes.

(My most delightful Martial, these are the things which make for a happier life: property not gained through toil but left by inheritance; goodly land, and an ever-burning hearth; no lawsuits, any suit rarely worn, a quiet mind; the faculties of a gentleman, a healthy body; discreet honesty, friends who are equals; a ready table for a simple feast; a night without drunkenness but free of care; a bed not unhappy but nonetheless chaste; sleep which makes the darkness short: want to be what you are, and don't hanker after anything; neither fear your final day, nor long for it.)

But in place of the [opening] spondee Catullus puts sometimes a choreus, sometimes an iamb, as in the poem to Marcus T[ullius] C[icero].⁵³⁴

Dīsērtissime Romuli nepotum,
Quōt sūnt, quotque fuere, Marce Tulli,
Quōtquē post aliis erunt in annis,
Grātias tibi maximas Catullus
[D6r] Āgīt, pessimus omnium poeta,
Tāntō pessimus omnium poeta,
Quāntō tu optimus omnium patronus.

(Most eloquent of the descendants of Romulus, as many as are, as many as have been, Marcus Tullius, and as many as will be ⁵³⁴ Catullus 49.

in other years, Catullus, worst of all poets, gives you the greatest of thanks: worst of all poets as much as you are the best of all patrons.)

A SAPPHIC consists of a choreus, a spondee, a dactyl, and two chorei,⁵³⁵ repeated three times, to which is added an adonic. [Horace,] Odes, II.10 [9–12]:

Sāepiūs vēntīs āġitātūr īngēns
Pinus, et celsae graviore casu
Decidunt turres, feriuntque summos
Fūlmīnā mōntēs.⁵³⁶

(More often is the huge pine stirred up by the winds, and it's the high towers that fall with the worst collapse, and the highest mountains the lightning strikes.)

The ELEGIAC pentameter consists of, in the first two feet, dactyls or spondees, in the third a spondee (of which the first syllable ends a word) with two anapaests.⁵³⁷ And it never appears separate from the epic hexameter. Tristia I, elegy 1 [1–2]:

Parve (nec invideo) sine me liber ibis in urbem:
Hēi mīhī, quōd dōmīnō nōn līcēt īrē tūō

(Little book (I don't grudge it), you will be going without me into the city: alas for me that it's not allowed for your master to go)

There are epic and iambic hexameters:

The EPIC is especially celebrated, consisting in the first four feet of spondees or dactyls, in the fifth of a dactyl, and in the sixth of a spondee. Virgil, Aeneid I [1]:

⁵³⁵ Again the final syllable may be scanned long, as is actually the case with 'ingens' in the quoted example.

⁵³⁶ See above for the modern reading. The scansion is the same.

⁵³⁷ Marginal note (cut off in the Folger/EEBO copy of 1621, supplied from 1618): 'commonly described as [two dactyls or spondees] with a long syllable, and two dactyls with another long syllable'; which is indeed how it is still commonly described.

Ārmă vīrūmquē cānō Trōiāe quī prīmŭs āb ōrīs (Arms I sing, and the man who first from the shores of Troy).

But in the fifth foot a spondee is sometimes substituted: but so that the slow movement of the metre should not offend the ears, the fourth then demands a dactyl,* as Eclogues IV [49]:

Chārā dēūm sŭbŏlēs, māgnŭm lŏvīs īncrēmētŭm (Child beloved of the gods, great foster-child of Jupiter).

* This rule the poet⁵³⁸ ignores three times:

Georgics III [276]:

Saxa per, et scopulos, et dēprēssās cōnvāllēs
(Through rocks and crags and sunken ravines)

Aeneid III [74]:

Nereidum matri ēt Nēptūno Āegāeō
(To the mother of the Nereids and Aegean Neptune) and Aeneid VII [634]:

Aut laeves ocreas lento ducunt argento
(Or beat light greaves out of slow silver),

[D6v]

and Ovid in the Metamorphoses once, namely:

⁵³⁸ i.e. Virgil.

I [117]:

Perque hyemes, aestusque, et ināequālēs āutūmnōs
(And through winters and summers and inconstant autumns).

¶ To be noted here is that a [fifth-foot] spondaic verse (which the poets charmingly put from time to time among the dactylic) ends with a word of four or three syllables; with a tetrasyllable, as:

Georgics I [221]:

Ante tibi Eoae Atlantides abscondantur
(Let the morning-daughters of Atlas [the Pleiades] set for you before)

Georgics, IV [270]:

Cecropiumque thymum et graveolentia centaurea
(Thyme of Attica and heavy-perfumed centaury)

Aeneid II [68]:

Constitit, atque oculis Phrygia agmina circumspexit
(He stood and gazed with his eyes around the Phrygian host)

Aeneid III [517]:

Armatumque auro circumspicit Oriona
(And observes Orion, armed with gold)

in the same [549]:

Cornua velatarum obvertimus antennarum

(We turn the ends of the covered sail-yards)

Aeneid V [320]:

Proximus huic, longo sed proximus intervallo
(Next after him, but next after a long gap)

in the same [761]:

Et lucus late sacer additus Anchisaeo
(And a sacred grove, wide-spreading, was bestowed on Anchises' [tomb])

Aeneid VIII [54]:

Pallantis proavi de nomine Pallantaeum (called Pallanteum, from the name of his forebear Pallas)

in the same [167]:

Discedens⁵³⁹ chlamydemque auro dedit intertextam (Departing, he gave [me] a cloak interwoven with gold)

in the same [345]:

Nec non et sacri monstrat nemus [A]rgileti
(And shows, too, the grove of sacred Argiletum)

Aeneid IX [196]:

Posse viam ad muros, et moenia Pallantaea

⁵³⁹ Butler prints 'Discedent', and also in 1618 and 1629, in error.

(To be able [to find] a way to the walls and fortifications of Pallanteum)

Aeneid XII:⁵⁴⁰

Quales Threïciae cum flumina Thermodontis and with a trisyllable, as:

(In place of the soft viola and the bright narcissus)

⁵⁴³ Most modern editions follow Bentley in deleting this line as part of an imperfect passage.

⁵⁴⁴ The reading is uncertain; some modern editions read 'Hyleus'.

Metamorphoses XV [356]:

(There is a story that in Pallene in the far north, there are men)

in the same [450]:

Haec Helenum cecinisse penatigero Aeneae
(That Helenus prophesied these things to Aeneas who carried the household gods);

however the monosyllable diis (the gods, ablative) is found in Virgil twice at the end of a [fifth-foot] spondaic line:

Aeneid III [12]:

Cum sociis, natoque, Penatibus, et magnis diis
(With my companions and son, household gods and great gods)

Aeneid VIII [679]:

Cum patribus, populoque, Penatibus et magnis dis
(With the senators and people, household gods and great gods).

The IAMBIC is a hexameter which has room for iambs in all its feet. [Horace,] Epodes, ode 16 [2]:

Suis et ipsa Roma viribus ruit
(And by her own strength Rome herself goes to ruin);

in order to temper the speed of the metre, however, a spondee can be put in any of the odd-numbered feet. Epodes, final ode [17.53]:

Quid obsēratīs aurībūs fūndīs prēcēs?

Nōn sāxā nūdīs sūrdiōrā nāvītīs

Nēptūnūs āltō tūndīt hībērnūs sālō

(Why do you pour out your prayers to ears that are stopped? Neptune in winter thunders with the deep sea against rocks that are not deafer to helpless sailors than this).

But here [in the following case], because the poem proceeds in alternating couplets, its feet are more often mutilated:⁵⁴⁵ Epodes, ode 2 [1–8]:⁵⁴⁶

Bēātūs illē quī prōcūl nēgōtīīs,

Ūt prīscā gēns mōrtālīūm,

Pātērnā rūrā būbūs ēxērcēt sūīs

Sōlūtūs ōmnī fōenōrē

Nēc ēxcītātūr clāssicō mīlēs trūcī

Nēc hōrrēt irātūm mārē

Fōrūmqvē vītāt, ēt sūpērbā cīvīūm

Pōtēntiōrūm līmīnā.

(Blessed he who far from worldly concerns, like the ancient race of mortals, works his ancestral lands with his own oxen, freed from all dealings at interest, and is not a soldier, stirred up by trumpets to slaughter, nor shudders at the angry sea, and avoids the forum and the proud portals of more powerful citizens.)

[D7v]

There are cases where the iambic tetrameter is read without a hexameter: Prudentius, Cathemerinon, hymn 11 [1–4]:

⁵⁴⁵ Or possibly, ‘because the poem proceeds in alternation, its dipodies (double feet) are more often mutilated’.

⁵⁴⁶ The iambics in this case are hexameters alternating with tetrameters. Butler marks only the scansion that is contrary to the standard iambic pattern; I have filled in the gaps. Final syllables are all marked long.

Quid est, quod arctūm cīrculum
Sōl iām recurrēns dēserit?
Chrīstūsne terrīs nāscitur,
Quī lūcis augēt trāmitem?

(Why is it that the returning sun now abandons its strict course? Is Christ born on earth, who increases the path of light?)

Moreover, in hexameter this can be observed (so that words in which two short syllables are consecutive should not be utterly excluded) that sometimes in place of an iamb in the second, third and fourth foot, a trochee⁵⁴⁷ is accepted; also a dactyl in the third, an anapaest in the fifth, and either in the first. But two iambs at least must always be kept.

Epodes, ode 2 [33]:

Āut āmītē lēvī rārā tēndīt rētīā (Or on a light fork stretches loose nets)

in the same [23]:

Libet iacerē mōdō sub antiqua ilice
(He likes just to lie beneath the ancient holm oak)

Epodes, ode 17 [12]:

Ālītībus atquē cānībūs hōmīcidam Hectorem
(Hector the man-killer [given] to the birds and dogs)

Epodes, ode 5 [91]:

Quīn ūbī perire iussus expiravero

⁵⁴⁷ Meaning three short syllables.

(And even when, summoned to die, I do die)

in the same [79]:

Priusque caelum sidet infērīūs mari

(The heaven shall sink lower than the sea, before)

Epodes, ode 2 [65]:

Pōsītōsque vernas ditis examen domus

(And the slaves in place there, the swarm of a rich man's house)

in the same [35]:

Pāvīdūmqŭē lēpōrem, et advenam lăquēō gruem

([Catch] in a snare the timorous hare and the migrant crane);

but the tetrameter sometimes has a dactyl or anapaest in the first foot, or a trochee in the second:

Epodes, ode 3 [8]:

Cānīdīa tractavit dapes

(Did Canidia get her hands on the meal?)

Epodes, ode 2 [62]:

Viderē prōpērantes domum

(To see hurrying home)

Ausonius, Epigrams 138:⁵⁴⁸

Bīpātēns pugillar expedi
(Get ready your folding writing-tablet).

And so out of all its iambs the iambic metre preserves at any rate the final one unchanged. Or rather, it takes a spondee even in the sixth foot, provided the fifth keeps its iamb: but a verse of this kind is called a scazon or choliambic, that is a limping iambic, as:

Martial, Book I, epigram 97:⁵⁴⁹

Si non molestum est, teque non pīgēt Scāzōn
(If it's no trouble and it doesn't annoy you, my scazon)

Catullus, to Varus:⁵⁵⁰

Sed non videmus manticae quōd īn tērgo ēst
(But we don't see the part of the satchel that's on our back)

Persius, Prologue [1–3]:

Nec fonte labra prolui cābāllinō

[D8r]

Nec in bīcīpīti somniassē Pērnāssō

Mēmīni, ūt repente sic poētā prōdīrēm

(I didn't wet my lips in the horse's fount [Hippocrene], nor do I remember having dreamt on the twin peaks of Parnassus, so as to suddenly prove myself a poet)

⁵⁴⁸ Book II, Ephemeris 7.3 in the Loeb Ausonius.

⁵⁴⁹ I.96.1.

⁵⁵⁰ 22.20.

Sometimes scazons are mixed with tetrameters.

Martial, Book I, epigram 62.⁵⁵¹

Verona docti syllabas āmāt vātīs:

Marone foelix Mantua est:

Censetur Apona Livio sūō tēllūs,

Stellaque nec Flacco minus:

Apollodoro plaudit imbrīfēr Nīlūs,

Nasone Peligni sonant:

Duosquē Sēnēcas, unicumquē Lūcānūm

Facundā lōquītur Corduba:

gaudent iocosae Canio sūō Gādēs,

Emēritā Dēcīano meo:

Te Liciniane, gloriabītūr nōstrā,

nec me tacebit Bilbilis.

(Verona loves the verses of its learned poet [Catullus]; Mantua is glad of its Virgil; the land of Padua rates its Livy, its Stella and no less its [Valerius] Flaccus; the rain-bearing Nile praises Apollodorus, the Pelignians sound the name of Ovid: eloquent Corduba talks of the two Senecas and the one and only Lucan: happy Gades rejoice in its Canius, Emerita in my friend Decianus: our Bilbilis will be proud of you, Licinianus, and will have something to say of me.)

And these are the main genera of metre: the others, if any have the inclination to know them, can be seen in the poets.

⁵⁵¹ l.61.

Chapter 15

Poetic metre has now been explained. RHETORICAL rhythm is one that is not undefined, but nonetheless differs both from poetic measure and continually from itself.

It is necessary to give attention to this rhythm, if you wish to speak elegantly, not only (as Aristotle and Theophrastus say) so that your speech does not carry on unstoppably, like a river: but also so that it has much more force. Nor indeed (as [Cicero] says to Brutus in the Orator⁵⁵²) would those thunderbolts of Demosthenes have resonated to so great an extent had they not been carried along, brandished, in his rhythms.

Here is the first rule [praeceptum]: in prose, avoid verse; although quotation from elsewhere is permissible, for the sake of lending authority or pleasure. Next, do not make either the beginning or end of prose from the beginning or end of a poem. [D8v] The beginning should be of less concern to you, the middle almost of none, but the clausula⁵⁵³ of the greatest: in it especially the completion and consummation of the measure are together shown and understood, and therefore it should be varied to the greatest degree so that it is repugnant neither to the mind on grounds of judgement nor to the ear on grounds of excess, nor is the crafting of the measure found wanting for being too uniform; but never more than six syllables from the end are to be taken into account. A clausula made up of all long syllables is rather slow-moving and uncommon; rarest of all is one of all short syllables; but one of a suitable combination of longs and shorts is very common. The whole matter is made clear in a passage of Cicero in the Orator.⁵⁵⁴

O Marce Druse, patrem appello
(Marcus Drusus, I call upon your father)

In the first section⁵⁵⁵ is a dichoreus; in the second, after a short syllable, there follow an iamb and a spondee. *⁵⁵⁶ ⁵⁵² 70.234.

⁵⁵³ The rhythmic close of a period or sentence.

⁵⁵⁴ Orator ad Brutum 63.213. Much of Butler's commentary also quotes Cicero's own; the quotations themselves are from a speech by C. Papirius Carbo Arvina.

⁵⁵⁵ Called in Latin an 'incisum', or in Greek, 'komma' (κόμμα).

⁵⁵⁶ Marginal notes in this chapter, cut off in the Folger/EEBO copy of 1621, are supplied from 1618 edition. In 1629 the notes to this chapter are much expanded.

* For neither ecthipsis nor synaloephe is used in prose; and a syllable ending in m, unelided, is short. See above on omitted ecthipsis.

Et⁵⁵⁷ tu dicere solebas sacram esse rem publicam

(And you were accustomed to say that the republic is sacred):

in the first section is a choreus, a pyrrhic and a spondee; in the second a choreus, a spondee and a pyrrhic. Again,

Quicumque eam violasset, ab omnibus ei poenas esse persolutas

(That whoever did violence to it would suffer punishment from everyone):

in the first, an iamb, a pyrric and a choreus; in the second, three chorei,⁵⁵⁸ since it is of no account whether the final syllable is long or short. Then,

Patris dictum sapiens temeritas filii comprobavit

(The son's wise boldness approved his father's saying):

in the second an iamb is followed by a dichoreus,* by which such an outburst was roused in the assembly as to be a wondrous thing.

* Cicero was especially fond of the dichoreus, such that in one oration, Pro Pompeio, it is used one hundred and fourteen times.

Change the word order, and make it thus, 'comprobavit filii temeritas', and all the charm and elegance is lost. Contrariwise⁵⁵⁹ if you take some ill-arranged period/clause (sententia) and change the order of the words a little, you may set it straight: that which before was vapid and loose may be made fit. Take this, from Gracchus' speech before the censors:

Abesse non potest quin eiusdem hominis sit probos improbare, qui improbos probet

(It cannot be otherwise than that the same man who approves of the unjust will disapprove of the just);

⁵⁵⁷ Butler's addition of 'Et' at the start is a mistake but it makes no difference as Butler starts his scansion at 'dicere'.

⁵⁵⁸ Modern editions alter the word order in Cicero's quotation, so that it ends with two chorei, not three.

⁵⁵⁹ This section is a quotation from Orator ad Brutum 70.233, as partially acknowledged in another marginal note.

how much more fitting had he said [D9r] ‘quin eiusdem hominis sit qui improbos probet, probos improbare’? And so for the sake of the measure, hyperbaton, that is, a moving of a word by some distance, or a transposition that inverts the order of words, is permitted. For* speech is often rough and harsh, loose or disjointed, if the words are ordered according to their requirement. Nor can rhythmical discourse do otherwise than the opportune change of word order.

* Fab[ius Quintilian], Book VIII, chapter 6 [62].

Therefore, these rules apply concerning the rhetorical measure of feet: which, however, practice will teach how to vary more elegantly and with more facility than will theory, and so will the technique of a skilled orator [better] than the instruction of a learned rhetorician.

Chapter 16

A figure of a speech (dictio) is in the measuring (dimensio) of its own sound; now follows the figure[s] that consist of the repetition of a sound, and moreover of the same and of distinct sounds. When of the same sound, the repetition may be immediate or with interruption (continuo vel disjuncte); when it is immediately repeated, it is epizeuxis or anadiplosis.

EPIZEUXIS is when the same sound is immediately repeated in the same sentence, and is either in part of a word, or the whole word. Epizeuxis of a part of a word is either of its beginning, as in Georgics I [389]:

Et sola in sicca secum spatiat^r arena
(And alone with himself stalks the sere sands)

and Metamorphoses I [363–4]:

O utinam possem populos reparare paternis
Artibus: atque animos formatae infundere terrae (Would I could repair the peoples with paternal skill, and pour spirits into the clods of clay):

here s and p are repeated three times, a twice and f once at the beginnings of words; since the prepositional prefixes re- and in- are seen not to hinder the epizeuxis of the letter at all;

or at the end, as in [Cicero,] De Haruspicum Responsis [6]

Titus Annius ad illam pestem comprimendam, exstinguendam, funditus delendam natus esse videtur (Titus Annius seems to have been born for the purpose of controlling, extinguishing and utterly defeating that plague).

[D9v]

In the following [example] there is epizeuxis of a word: Terence, Andria [282]:

O Mysis, Mysis;

In Verrem VII:⁵⁶⁰

Crux, crux (inquam) infoelici et misero⁵⁶¹

(A cross – a cross I say – for the unhappy and wretched man);

Virgil, Eclogues V [64]:

Ipsa sonant arbusta, deus, deus ille, Menalca

(The very orchards sound out, ‘A god, a god he is, Menalcas!’);

Heroides 21:⁵⁶²

Si, nisi quae facie poterit te digna videri,

Nulla futura tua est; nulla futura tua est

(If no one will be yours unless she seems worthy of you in appearance – no one will be yours).

Sometimes a parenthesis is placed between the repeated words; however, it comes to the same thing, since the repetition carries on as if the parenthesis were not there. Philippics II [26.64]:

Hasta posita pro aede Iovis Statoris, bona⁵⁶³ (miserum me, consumptis enim lacrimis, tamen infixus haeret animo dolor) bona (inquam) Cn. Pompeii Magni, voci acerbissimae subiecta praeconis.

(A spear was set up before the temple of Jupiter Stator, and the goods (it makes me wretched, for I am consumed with tears and a permanent anguish is set in my heart), the goods (I say) of Cnaeus Pompey the Great went under the most disagreeable voice of an auctioneer.)

⁵⁶⁰ II.5.162.

⁵⁶¹ Modern editions read ‘aerumnoso’.

⁵⁶² 15.39–40.

⁵⁶³ Modern editions add ‘Cn. Pompeii’ here, to even greater effect, since the emphasis then falls on Pompey’s cognomen ‘Magni’ (the Great).

Chapter 17

It is ANADIPLOSIS⁵⁶⁴ when the same sound is immediately repeated in different sentences,⁵⁶⁵ that is, at the end of the preceding sentence and the beginning of the following. Virgil, Eclogues X [72–3]:

Pierides, vos haec facietis maxima Gallo:
Gallo, cuius amor tantum mihi crescit in horas
(You Muses, who make these songs greatest of all to Gallus:
To Gallus, whose love grows in me hour by hour).

This figure is repeated three times and with the same word: In Catilinam I [1.2]:

Hic tamen vivit: vivit? imo vero etiam in senatum venit
(But this man lives: lives? Not just that, he even comes to the Senate), then [2.4]

Vivis: et vivis non ad deponendam, sed ad confirmandam audaciam (You live: and you live not so you can lay aside, but so you can redouble your temerity), and then [2.6]

Quamdiu quisquam erit, qui te defendere audeat, vives: et vives, ita ut nunc vivis
(As long as there's anyone bold enough to defend you, you will live: and you will live just as you live now).

Heroides I [81–84]:

⁵⁶⁴ In the margin, 'reduplicatio'.

⁵⁶⁵ The term 'sententia' can mean clause or period, as well as sentence in the modern sense.

Me pater Icarius viduo discedere lecto

Cogit, et immensas increpat usque moras.

Increpet usque licet, tua sum, tua dicar oportet:

Penelope coniux semper Ulyssis ero

(My father Icarius makes me leave my empty bed and bellows against my endless delays. Let him bellow all he likes, I am yours, I ought to be called yours: I will always be Penelope, wife of Ulysses.)

And here we find CLIMAX,⁵⁶⁶ namely, when anadiplosis is extended through several steps. [D10r] Pro Milone [23.61]:⁵⁶⁷

Nec vero se populo solum, sed senatui commisit: nec senatui modo, sed etiam publicis praesidiis et armis: neque his tantum, sed eius potestati, cui senatus totam rem publicam [...] commisit

(But he put himself into the trust not only of the people, but of the Senate; not only of the senate, but also of public armed guards; not only of these, but of the power of the man to whom the Senate entrusted the whole republic);

*Rhetorica Ad Herennium*⁵⁶⁸ [25]:

Nam quae reliqua spes libertatis manet, si illis et quod libet, licet; et quod licet, possunt; et quod possunt, audent; et quod audent, faciunt; et quod faciunt, vobis molestum non est?

(For what hope of freedom is left remaining, if what they want, they are allowed to do; and what they are allowed to do, they can do; and what they can do, they dare do; and what they dare do, they actually do; and what they actually do, you don't mind?)

⁵⁶⁶ In the margin: 'gradatio'.

⁵⁶⁷ Modern editions vary from this text in a number of particulars but the general rhetorical effect is the same.

⁵⁶⁸ Formerly attributed to Cicero.

Chapter 18

Next comes the repetition of the same sound with interruption; and it can be in the same position in the sentence, or in a different one: in the same position, it is anaphora or epistrophe.

It is ANAPHORA⁵⁶⁹ when the same sound is repeated at the beginning of sentences or clauses. [Cicero,] De Lege Agraria I:⁵⁷⁰

Tamen ne vexari rem publicam, contemni maiestatem Populi Romani, deludi vosmet ipsos diutius a Tribuno plebis patiamini⁵⁷¹
(Do not however allow any longer the republic to be damaged, the majesty of the Roman People to be scorned, your own selves to be made fun of by the tribune of the people);

In Catilinam I [1.1]:

Nihilne te nocturnum praesidium palatii, nihil urbis vigiliae, nihil timor populi, nihil concursus bonorum civium, nihil hic munitissimus habendi senatus locus, nihil horum ora vultusque moverunt?
(Does it the night-time guard on the Palatium mean nothing to you? Do the city's watchmen mean nothing? Does populace's terror mean nothing? Do the meetings of honest citizens mean nothing? Does this most heavily fortified place for holding the Senate mean nothing? Do the faces and expressions of these men mean nothing?)

Georgics IV [465–6]:

Te, dulcis coniux, te solo in littore secum,
Te veniente die, te decedente canebat.
(You, his sweet wife, it was you he sang by himself alone on the shore, you at the coming day, you as it departed);

⁵⁶⁹ In margin, 'relatio'.

⁵⁷⁰ II.29.79.

⁵⁷¹ Modern editions read 'Tammenne ... patiemini?' as a question. The anaphora is of the -i ending of a present participle passive, at the beginning of each clause. I have added two commas to make this clearer.

Ovid, Ars Amatoria [l.585–6]:

Tuta frequensque via est, per amici fallere nomen:

Tuta frequensque licet sit via, crimen habet.

(Safe and busy is the road by which you deceive in the name of friendship; safe and busy the road may be: it's an offence);

Pro Roscio Amerino [5.13]:

Accusant ii qui in fortunas huius invaserunt: causam dicit is, cui praeter calamitatem nihil reliquerunt. Accusant ii, quibus occidi patrem Sexti Rosci bono fuit: causam dicit is, cui non modo luctum mors patris attulit, verum etiam egestatem. Accusant ii, qui hunc ipsum summe iugu- [D10v] lare cupierunt: causam dicit is, qui etiam ad hoc iudicium cum praesidio venit, ne hic ibidem ante oculos vestros trucidaretur. Denique accusant ii, quos populus poscit: causam dicit is, qui unus relictus ex nefaria illorum caede restat.

(They are the accusers, who took possession of this man's possessions:⁵⁷² he is the defendant, whom they left with nothing but calamity; they are the accusers, who profited from killing Sextus Roscius' father: he is the defendant, for whom a father's death brought not just grief but also penury; they are the accusers, who wanted to be rid of this man in the most extreme way: he is the defendant, who even came to this trial with an armed guard, lest he be cut ot pieces here before your eyes. Finally, they are the accusers, whom the populace is calling for punishment: he is the defendant, who is here as the single survivor of their heinous slaughter.)

There⁵⁷³ are two anaphoras here, which alternate their sounds.

⁵⁷² Literally 'Fortunes': see chapter 2, above.

⁵⁷³ Marginal note partially cut off in EEBO/Folger copy, and supplied from 1618 edition.

Chapter 19

It is EPISTROPHE⁵⁷⁴ where the same sound is repeated in the clausulae.

And here very often a rhetorical rhythm is echoed, through equivalent clauses (in membris paribus): which for that reason are called ὁμοιοτέλευτα (homoioteleuta), that is, ending in the same way. Pro Pompeio:⁵⁷⁵

Ut eius [...] voluntatibus non modo cives adsenserint, socii obtemperarint, hostes obedierint, sed etiam venti tempestatesque obsecundarint

(So that to his will not only did the citizens assent, his allies conform, his enemies subject themselves, but even the winds and storms showed obedience).

Here the first three clauses are almost of six syllables each, but the last is longer; nor is an appearance of equal length demanded.

Pro Milone [4.10]:

Est enim haec (iudices) non scripta, sed nata lex: quam non didicimus, accepimus, legimus; verum ex ipsa natura arripuimus, hausimus, expressimus: ad quam non docti, sed facti; non instituti, sed imbuti sumus

(For this law (judges) was not written but born; and we have not learned it, received it, or read it; but from nature herself we have taken possession of it, drunk it in, wrung it out; and we were not instructed in it but made in it; not educated in it but instilled with it).

Here there are four paired quasi-verses that echo their sounds, punctuated by almost equal breaths:⁵⁷⁶ the first two are of three syllables, ‘non scripta, sed nata’; the two following of more than twelve; the two following again of three; the final two of four.

⁵⁷⁴ In the margin, ‘conversio’.

⁵⁷⁵ De Imperatorio Cn. Pompeii, 16.48.

⁵⁷⁶ Cf. De Oratore III.51.198.

But in the examples already given only the endings of the words are repeated: in the following, a word itself is duplicated. Philippics II [22.55]:

Doletis tres exercitus populi Romani interfectos? interfecit Antonius. Desideratis clarissimos cives? eos quoque eripuit Antonius. Autoritas huius ordinis afflicta est? afflixit Antonius (You mourn that three hosts of the Roman people were killed? It was Antony that killed them. You miss the most eminent citizens? It was Antony that deprived you of them too. Is the authority of this order damaged? It was Antony that damaged it).

And from anaphora and epistrophe combined comes SYMPLOCE.⁵⁷⁷ De Lege Agraria I [8.22]:

[D11r]

Quis legem tulit? Rullus. Quis maiorem populi partem suffragiis prohibuit? Rullus. Quis comitiis praefuit? Idem Rullus.⁵⁷⁸ (Who brought the law? Rullus. Who prevented the greater part of the populace from voting? Rullus? Who presided over the voting assemblies? The same Rullus).

Martial, Book II [18. 1–6]:⁵⁷⁹

Capto tuam (pudet heu) sed capto, Maxime, coenam:
 Tu captas alias: iam sumus ergo pares.
Mane salutatum venio: tu diceris isse
 Ante salutatum: iam sumus ergo pares.
Sum comes ipse tuus tumidique anteambulo regis:
 Tu comes alterius: iam sumus ergo pares.
(I'm hankering after your dinner-invitation, Maximus, (I'm ashamed to say) I'm hankering. You hanker after others': so there we ⁵⁷⁷ In the margin, 'complexio'.

⁵⁷⁸ This figure as given in modern editions of De Lege Agraria is substantially longer.

⁵⁷⁹ Sometimes numbered II.17.

are equal. I come to pay my respects in the morning: you, it's said, have already gone to pay yours: so there we are equal. I make up your retinue and walk before my puffed-up patron; you make up another's: so there we are equal.)

Chapter 20

So these are the repetitions of sounds in the same positions in the sentence: next come the two kinds of repetition in different positions, epanalepsis and epanodos.

It is EPANALEPSIS⁵⁸⁰ where the same sound is repeated in the beginning and the clausula of the same sentence. In Verrem IV:⁵⁸¹

Saluti potius eorum consulam quam voluntati⁵⁸²
(I shall have more thought of their safety than of their wishes)

Aeneid I [750]:

Multa super Priamo rogicans, super Hectore multa (Asking many things about Priam, many about Hector);

In Verrem VII:⁵⁸³

Multi et graves dolores inventi, parentibus et propinquis multi (Many and terrible agonies were found, and many for parents and relatives);

⁵⁸⁰ In the margin, 'resumptio'.

⁵⁸¹ II.2.11

⁵⁸² The dative ending -ti is repeated.

⁵⁸³ 2.5.119.

Martial, Book I, epigram 33:⁵⁸⁴

Non amo te, Sabidi, nec possum dicere quare:

Hoc tantum possum dicere, non amo te.

(I love you not, Sabidius, and I can't say why:

Only I can say this: I love you not.)

and Book VIII, epigram 21 [1–2]:

Phosphore, redde diem: quid gaudia nostra moraris?

Caesare venturo, Phosphore, redde diem.

(Day-star, bring back the daylight: why are you holding up our celebrations?

With Caesar coming, Day-star, bring back the daylight)

⁵⁸⁴ Now usually numbered I.32.

Chapter 21

It is EPANODOS⁵⁸⁵* where the same sound is repeated in the beginning and clausula of different sentences or clauses but with anadiplosis in between.

* that is, where two sounds, one at the beginning, the other at the end of a sentence, are repeated in inverse order in the following sentence.⁵⁸⁶

In Verrem III:⁵⁸⁷

Habuit honorem ut proditori, non ut amico fidem
(He held him in honour as a traitor, not in trust as a friend)

[Cicero,] Pro Plancio [28.68]:

Gratiam qui refert habet: et qui habet, eo quod habet, refert⁵⁸⁸
(He who gives thanks is thanked; and he who is thanked, by virtue of the fact that he is, gives thanks)

Heroides 2 [25–6]:

[D11v]

Demophoon ventis et verba, et vela dedisti;
Vela queror reditu, verba carere fide (Demophoon, you gave both your words and your sails to the winds:
I cry for the sails' return, as the words were devoid of trust);

⁵⁸⁵ In the margin, 'regressio'.

⁵⁸⁶ Marginal note partially cut off and supplied from 1618 edition.

⁵⁸⁷ 2.1.38.

⁵⁸⁸ Modern editions reproduce a more verbose version of the text, to the same effect.

Eclogues VIII [49–50]:

Crudelis mater magis, an puer improbus ille?

Improbus ille puer; crudelis tu quoque, mater.

(Was it rather the mother was cruel, or that boy wicked?

That boy was wicked; and you, the mother, were cruel);

Cicero:*

Vestrum etiam hic factum deprehenditur, patres conscripti, non meum (at pulcherrimum quidem factum) verum, ut dixi, non meum, sed vestrum.

(And your work is found here, senators, not mine – but a very beautiful deed indeed – but as I said, not mine, but yours).

*quoted by Fabius [Quintilian], Book IX, chapter 3 [40].⁵⁸⁹ ⁵⁸⁹ Note, not in evidence in 1621, supplied from the 1618 edition.

Chapter 22

Thus are the figures of speech (dictio) in the repetition of the same sounds: here follow two in the repetition of slightly distinct sounds, paronomasia and polyptoton.

It is PARONOMASIA⁵⁹⁰ when by the altering of a letter or syllable, a word is also changed in meaning. In Verrem II:⁵⁹¹

Nam, ut apertus in corripiendis pecuniis; sic in spe corrumpendi iudicii (For he was as blatant in stealing money, as he was in corrupting the courts);

In Catilinam I [11.27]:

Ut [...] non emissus ex urbe, sed immissus in urbem esse videatur
(That he might seem not to have been sent away from the city but sent into the city).

Such is this in Quintilian:*

Emit morte immortalitatem (With his death he bought immortality);

* Book 9, chapter 3 [71]

Martial takes from this the material for a joke; Book I, epigram 99:⁵⁹²

Litigat et podagra Diodorus, Flacce, laborat.
Sed nil patrono porrigit: haec cheragra est

⁵⁹⁰ In the margin, 'adnominatio'.

⁵⁹¹ I.2.5

⁵⁹² I.98.

(Diodorus goes to law when, Flaccus, he labours with gout in his feet.

But he offers nothing to his patron: that is gout in the hands!)

From this also comes that line of Cato's,* who ... cum cuidam dixisset, Eamus deambulatum; et ille, Quid opus est de? Imo vero, inquit, quid opus est te?⁵⁹³

(when he said to someone, Let us deambulate,⁵⁹⁴ and he replied, What's the need for the 'de-'? replied, No, what's the need for thee?)

* in Cicero, De Oratore [II.63.256]

⁵⁹³ 'This appears to us moderns a very poor joke. No translation can make it intelligible to those who do not understand the original' – John Selby Watson.

⁵⁹⁴ deambulate 1. (rare): to go out walking; to stroll (en/wiktionary/org).⁵⁹⁵ In margin, 'variatio casuum'.

Chapter 23

It is POLYPTOTON,⁵⁹⁵ when words of the same origin sound together in different cases.

‘Case’ here signifies every variation in a word: whether that be in mood, tense, person, case, gender or number.⁵⁹⁶

[Cicero,] Pro Caelio [24.58]:

Ipsius autem veneni quae ratio fingitur? ubi quaesitum est? [...] quo pacto? cui? quo in loco traditum?

(But what account has been made up of the poison itself? Where was it found? By what means? Where was it handed over? To whom?)

Aeneid IV [628–9]:

[D12r]

Littora littoribus contraria, fluctibus undas

Imprecor, arma armis ...

(I call on shore to oppose shore, waters against waves, arms against arms);

In Verrem VII.⁵⁹⁷

Certus locus, certa lex, certum tribunal, quo hoc reservetur

(There is a fixed place, a fixed law, and a fixed lawcourt for which it is reserved), and the line quoted in Quintilian:*

⁵⁹⁵ In margin, ‘variatio casuum’.

⁵⁹⁶ Marginal note (here on the opposite page), supplied from 1629 edition.

⁵⁹⁷ II.5.79.

Non ut edam vivo, sed ut vivam edo
(I do not live to eat, but eat to live).

* Book IX, chapter 3 [85]

There is also an example of CLIMAX or gradatio here: for polyptoton is extended in its steps with varied words, as above anadiplosis was with the same words: Ovid, Fasti III [21]:

Mars videt hanc, visamque cupit, potiturque cupita
(Mars sees her, and desires what he sees, and possesses what he desires);

Ad Herennium [IV.25.34]:

Africano virtutem industria, virtus gloriam, gloria aemulos comparavit
(For Africanus his industry brought excellence, his excellence brought glory, and his glory brought rivals);

Eclogues II [63–4]:

Torva leaena lupum sequitur, lupus ipse capellam,
Florentem cytisum sequitur lasciva capella
(The fierce lioness goes after the wolf, the wolf himself goes after the goat,
The frisky she-goat goes after the flowering clover).

Notes to chapters 22 and 23

¶ Varying sounds are repeated in the same places in which the same sounds are also repeated; and so there will be some sense in bringing in the names of the preceding figures here: so that the repetitions of slightly different sounds in paronomasia and polyptoton should also be distinguished according to their genera.

There is epizeuxis in a paronomasia at Aeneid II [494]:

Fit via vi

(A way is made by force);

epizeuxis in a polyptoton at Metamorphoses, Book XV [88–90]:

Heu quantum scelus est in viscera viscera condi

Congestoque avidum pinguescere corpore corpus

Alteriusque animantem animantis vivere letho?

(Alas how great a crime is it for innards to be hidden within innards and for a body to grow greedily fat on the body it has ingested, and a living being to live by the death of another living being?);

anadiplosis in a paronomasia, Aeneid IV [138–9]:

Cui pharetra ex humeris,⁵⁹⁸ crines nodantur in aurum,

Aurea purpuream subnectit fibula vestem

(Her quiver slung from her shoulders, her hair is knotted in gold, a golden brooch fastens her purple cloak);

anadiplosis in a polyptoton, Metamorphoses I [141–2]:

Iamque nocens ferrum, ferroque nocentius aurum

Prodierat: prodit bellum quod pugnat utroque

(And now there came harmful iron, and more harmful than iron, gold: and there came war which is fought with both);

[D12v]

anaphora in a paronomasia, Metamorphoses II [138–9]:

⁵⁹⁸ Modern editions read ‘ex auro’, extending the figure further; ‘ex auro’ predates Butler, so his choice of another reading is likely to be deliberate.

Neu te dexterior tortum declinet ad anguem,
Neve sinisterior pressam rota ducat ad aram
(Let it not take you off course to the right towards the writhing Serpent, Nor lead your wheels to the left towards the Altar, low down);

anaphora in a polyptoton, De Haruspicum Responsis [38]:

Homines te propter pecuniam⁵⁹⁹ iudicio liberarunt: hominibus iniuria tui stupri dolori non fuit: homines tibi arma, alii in me, alii post in illum invictum civem dederunt: hominum beneficia prorsus concedo tibi (It is men have set you free in judgement on account of money; it was not men who took no offence at the insult of your debauchery; it is men have given you their weapons, some against me, others afterwards against that undefeated citizen; it is men's goodwill I certainly grant you [...]);

epistrophe in a paronomasia, in Quintilian, Book IX, chapter 3 [80]:

Neminem posse alteri dare matrimonium, nisi penes quem sit patrimonium (That no one can give a woman in matrimony to another, unless he be in possession of a patrimony);

epistrophe in a polyptoton, Metamorphoses I [556]:

Oscula dat ligno; refugit tamen oscula lignum
(He gives kisses to the wood, but the wood shrinks from his kisses);

symploce in a paronomasia, In Catilinam I [10.27]:

Ut exul potius tentare, quam Consul vexare rem publicam possis
(You may be able rather to agitate the republic as an exile than to plague it as a consul);

⁵⁹⁹ Modern editions have a different text here.

epanalepsis in a paronomasia, Metamorphoses I [742]:

Ungulaque in quinos dilapsa absumitur ungues (And a hoof, melting away, is formed into five nails)

epanalepsis in a polyptoton, *In Catilinam*⁶⁰⁰ I [2.6]:

Vives: et vives, ita ut nunc vivis
(You will live: and you will live just as you live now);

epanodos in a paronomasia, Orator ad Brutum [70.233]

Abesse non potest quin eiusdem hominis sit, qui improbos probet, probos improbare⁶⁰¹
(It cannot be otherwise than that the same man who approves of the unjust will disapprove of the just);

epanodos in a polyptoton, Metamorphoses IV [713]:

Umbra viri visa est, visam fera saevit in umbram
([When] the shadow of a man is seen, the beast rages at the shadow it saw);

[Amores,] Book II, elegy 19 [36]:

Quod sequitur, fugio; quod fugit, ipse sequor
(I fly from what pursues; what flies from me, I pursue);

Heroides 16:⁶⁰²

⁶⁰⁰ The 1621 edition reads 'Met[amorphoses]' in error; correct in 1618.

⁶⁰¹ Quoted above, presumably from memory, with a different word order.

⁶⁰² 17.151–2.

At tu dissimula, ni tu⁶⁰³ desistere mavis.

Sed cur desistas? dissimulare potes

(But you, dissimulate, unless you prefer to end it:

But why end it? You can dissimulate) and Pro Caecina [3.8]:

Quia res indigna sit, ideo turpem existimationem sequi; quia turpis existimatio sequitur, ideo rem indignam non vindicari

(That because a thing is unworthy, therefore a shameful reputation follows; because a shameful reputation follows, therefore the unworthy thing is not punished).

⁶⁰³ Modern editions read 'nisi si'.

Chapter 24

A figure of speech (dictio) is of the kind described. A figure of thought (sententia) is a figure that affects the whole sentence with some movement of the heart and mind (animus).⁶⁰⁴

But it also achieves a certain manly dignity, beyond the soft and delicate grace of the figures mentioned above: just as in those seem to be the colour and blood of speech, in this seem to be the sinews and muscles. And so, says Tullius [Cicero] in the Brutus [37.141], because Demosthenes was preeminent for the ornamenting and organisation of his sentences, for that reason he is judged by the learned to be the prince of orators. And he confirms this again in the Orator [39.136]. Thus, therefore, Tullius gives the primacy of style to this last genus of ornamentation; and to be sure style can be no more forceful than in these war-engines for persuading minds: for in this respect γοητεία καὶ ψυχαγωγία (goēteia and psukhagōgia)⁶⁰⁵ is the summation of elocution. Finally, as that elocution in both tropes and figures of a word, discussed first, has much power to delight and instruct, so this too (which is the fundamental point of speaking) will have the greatest power of moving and thoroughly winning over.

A figure of thought is in logismus or dialogismus.⁶⁰⁶ It is logismus, when a sentence is fashioned without dialogue, and it is either ecphonesis, withdrawal (revocatio),⁶⁰⁷ apostrophe or prosopopoeia.

ECPHONESIS⁶⁰⁸ is a figure in thought (logismo) expressed or understood by an adverb of exclamation: and certainly it is a great tool for moving the heart and mind and indeed for producing various effects, at one time, of wonder:

⁶⁰⁴ 'Figura Sententiae, is a figure, which for the forcible moving of affections, doth after a sort beautifie the sense and very meaning if a sentence: because it carries with it a certain manly majesty, which far surpasses the soft delicacy of the former Figures, they being as it were effeminate and musical, these virile and majestic' (Smith, Mysterie, B4r).

⁶⁰⁵ Witchcraft and leading of the mind (cf. Plato, Phaedrus 261a).

⁶⁰⁶ Greek words, not much used in Classical Latin, meaning (respectively) reasoning and argument by question and answer. 'A Figure of a sentence is either in thought and musing, by the Greeks called in Logismo, or in questioning and answering, called in Dialogismo' (Smith, Mysterie, B4r).

⁶⁰⁷ See chapter 25.

⁶⁰⁸ In the margin, 'exclamatio'.

[Cicero,] Pro Marcello:⁶⁰⁹ ‘O wondrous clemency, fit to be honoured in the praise of all men, public proclamation, writings and monuments!’;

[E1V] at another, of desperation: Pro Milone [34.94]: ‘O how vain were the labours I undertook! How deceptive my hopes! How pointless my deliberations!’; at another, of a wish: Heroides I [5–6]:

O would that when he made for Sparta with his fleet,
The adulterer had been swamped by violent waves!;

at another, of indignation: In Pisonem [24.56]: ‘O you scoundrel! You pestilence! You disgrace!’; at another, of mockery: in the same speech [24.58]: ‘O you foolish Camilli, Curii, Fabricii, Calatini, Scipios, Marcelli, Maximi! You crazy Paulus! Idiot Marius!’

Proh (O!, Alas!) is often employed for display of emotion (ostentatio): Terence, Andria [237]:

Alas by all our trust in gods and men! If this isn’t an insult, what is?

En (Lo!) sometimes shows something to be sad and wretched: Eclogues I [70–72]:

Will a wicked soldier occupy such virgin lands as these, and a barbarian these cornfields? O see how civil strife brings about the misery of citizens! Alas⁶¹⁰ for those for whom we sow our fields!

Ah, Heu and Eheu (Alas!) are adverbs of inciting compassion (commiseratio);⁶¹¹ [Cicero,] De Officiis I [39.139]: ‘O, you old house! Alas, you are lorded over by how different a lord!’;

Eclogues II [58–9]:

⁶⁰⁹ In fact, Pro Ligario 2.6. The wonder in this case is somewhat tongue-in-cheek.

⁶¹⁰ ‘En queis’; modern editions read ‘His nos’.

⁶¹¹ ‘Commiserationis’: commiseratio was also the term for the part of an oration specifically dedicated to inciting compassion.

Alas, what did I wish for myself, wretch that I am? I am ruined, I've let the south wind into my blossoms and the wild boars into my running streams. Ah, madman, who are you running away from?

In these the questioning is urged more forcefully: and it is suitable for serious and important cases.

Sometimes an exclamation is one of invocation, or imprecation: Aeneid I [603–5]:

[E2r]

Gods (if divine powers have any regard for the dutiful; if there is anything of justice anywhere, and a mind that is conscious of its own right) bring you worthy reward!;

Aeneid II [535–7]:

But for your crime (he cried out) and for such brazen things, let the gods (if there is any righteousness in heaven that looks to such things) pay you back as you deserve!

EPIPHONEMA is also a species of exclamation, which is customarily added at the end of a narration or explanation, as when Virgil has set out the various reasons for which Juno was persecuting the Romans; at the end he exclaims (Aeneid I [33]):

A work of such trouble was it to found the Roman race!

Chapter 25

It is a withdrawal (revocatio) of itself, when anything is withdrawn, and it is like the cooling down of a fiery sentence; and it is [known as] epanorthosis or aposiopesis.

It is EPANORTHOSIS,⁶¹² when something that has gone before is withdrawn by correcting it. [Cicero,] Epistulae [Ad Familiares] I [9.10]: ‘This was a matter of grief to me; but much more so was this, that they were embracing my enemy – mine, though? Rather the enemy of our laws, justice, peace, and our fatherland and all good men – like that, holding him in their arms like that, making a fuss of like that, and, in my presence, kissing him like that!’;

Terence, Heautontimorumenos [93–5]:⁶¹³

I have an only son, a young lad. Oh, what have I said – that I have one? Rather, Chremes, I had one. Whether I have one now or not, I don’t know.

Here something that was said before is withdrawn; in the following examples the previous course of a speech is gone back on, and signifies as it were a repentance for the fact; Pro Ligario [3.9]: ‘But I am being too [E2v] insistent: the young man seems moved’; Pro Caelio [15.35]: ‘But why have I brought in a personage so important?’; Ad [Quintum] Fratrem [1.1.6.18]: ‘But for some reason my talk has slipped into teaching mode, when that hadn’t been my intention to start with’.

⁶¹² In the margin, ‘correctio’.

⁶¹³ Displayed as prose by Butler. I have added line breaks.

Chapter 26

It is APOSIOPESIS⁶¹⁴ when the course of a sentence already begun is withdrawn, by leaving unsaid some part of it, which nevertheless is to be understood; Terence, The Eunuch [989–90]:

You rogue, if I live, I'll ...!;

Aeneid I [133–5]:

Do you now, winds, mix up heaven and earth with no command from me, and dare to raise up such confusion? You whom I – but better to settle the billowing sea.

⁶¹⁴ In the margin, 'reticentia'.

Chapter 27

Such is the logismus of exclamation and withdrawal: now follows that kind which is found in apostrophe and prosopopoeia.

It is APOSTROPHE⁶¹⁵ when the speech turns to a person other than who the speech calls for as addressee: it is a figure not far inferior to exclamation in the genus of elevated speech, and very often found in conjunction with it. But apostrophe can be variously distinguished by the status of the persons concerned: in one place the turning is to a human figure; so Tullius [Cicero], turning away from the judges, to whom the speech is addressed, to Cato, who had found fault with his defence, says in Pro Murena [2.3]: ‘By whom, pray, is it more right for a consul to be defended, Marcus Cato, [E3r] than by a consul?’ and so on. In another place the turning away is from men to the gods, notable among which in the poets is invocation. Metamorphoses I [2–4]:

Gods (for it was you that made those very changes), breathe on my undertaking: lead my song unbroken from the world’s first beginning of the world to my own times;

in the same way in Aeneid I [8–11], as the poet has set out the theme of the whole Aeneid, so he turns to the Muse:

Muse, bring to my mind the reasons, what divinity was slighted, and why the queen of the gods in her grief drove a man outstading for his dutifulness to endure so many misfortunes, and come upon so much toil: is there such great anger in the hearts of the gods?;

in another place the speech is turned towards a dumb and inanimate thing, just as towards a person; Pro Milone [31.85]: ‘By heavens those sacred places, and the altars,⁶¹⁶ when they saw that beast die, seem to have roused themselves and preserved their rights regarding him. For you Alban hills and groves, you (I say) I implore and call to witness, and you, the altars of the Albans, overthrown but fellow and equal with the rites of the Roman people, which that prince in his madness, after felling and throwing down the holiest groves, has crushed with the insane weight of his building foundations’.

⁶¹⁵ In the margin, ‘aversio’.

⁶¹⁶ ‘ipsae, araeque cum’: modern editions read ‘ipsae, quae’.

This figure, rarely indeed but now and then nevertheless, is employed immediately at the start of a speech; In Catilinam I [1.1]: ‘How long I ask you, Catiline, will you abuse our patience? How long too will you make fun of us with this madness of yours? to what end will this unbridled audacity hurl itself?’ But here the case is taking place in the Senate, and so the speech is addressed to the senators; from which the turning away is understood.

[E3v]

Chapter 28

It is PROSOPOPOEIA,⁶¹⁷ in which we pretend that another person is talking in our speech.

And this is a unique ornament of rhetorical style, and to start with of great boldness; and so it must be controlled with great consideration and judgement, so that appropriate speech is accorded to the characters in question. It is a highly poetic ornament and by it alone the praiseworthiness of poets is especially judged. Therefore, if there should be a reason for decoration anywhere, it is with this figure: about which the poet [Horace] gives good warning in the Ars Poetica [112–18]:

If the words of the speaker are discordant with his circumstances, the Romans, knights or not, will raise a bellow of laughter. It is greatly important whether it is Dave the slave speaking, or a hero, a mature old man or a headstrong lad still in the flower of youth, or a powerful matron, or a solicitous nurse, a travelling merchant or the farmer of a little green field, a Colchian or an Assyrian, one nursed in Thebes, or in Argos;

and in the same poem [105–7]:

Sad words befit a mournful face; ones full of threats, an angry one; wanton ones, a playful one; serious words, a severe one.⁶¹⁸

Prosopopoeia is imperfect or perfect.

Imperfect prosopopoeia is when the speech of another person is represented lightly and indirectly. Caesar, De Bello Gallico, Book I [7.3], on the ambassadors of the Helvetii, ‘who were to say that they intended to pass through the province with no hostile intent, on the grounds that they had no other route, and to ask that they be allowed to do this with his blessing’; [De Imperio C. Pompeii] Pro Lege Manilia [5.13]: ‘These silently ask you (since to speak freely is not possible) to think them just as worthy as their allies from other provinces, whose protection you have commended to such a man’.

⁶¹⁷ In margin (supplied from 1618 edition), ‘fictio personae’.

⁶¹⁸ ‘seria dicta’. Modern editions read ‘dictu’ (words serious in expression).

Perfect prosopopoeia is when the complete feigning of a character is represented in our speech: and in this [E4r] kind (genus) both the lead into and departure from the prosopopoeia ought especially to be suitable. So in Pro Caelio [14.33–5] Appius [Claudius] Caecus⁶¹⁹ is summoned up to berate the wantonness of Clodia: ‘Then let someone [says Cicero] from that family rise up, and most powerfully of all the blind one himself (for he will be least grieved who can’t see that woman), who if he rose up would surely act and speak like this’. Here the lead in and preparation has the appearance of a prelude: then the voice and figure of Appius is feigned: ‘Woman, what have you to do with Caelius; with a very young man; with one who is not yours?’ and so on; and to put an end to this prosopopoeia, a short turning away (revocatio) is placed at the end with these words: ‘But why, judges, have I brought in a personage so important that I’m even afraid in case this very Appius suddenly return and begin to accuse Caelius with that censor’s gravity of his?’

In this way Virgil in Aeneid II⁶²⁰ has composed Aeneas’ prosopopoeia, when Aeneas shares the food and wine among his colleagues and [l. 197–9] ‘comforts their grieving hearts with these words’:

My companions – for we haven’t been unacquainted with ills before – O, we have suffered worse! The god will give an end to these too, and so on; and in due course he closes the prosopopoeia thus [l.208]:

Such things speaks he [...]

With the same figure it is allowable to give dumb and inanimate things speech; of this sort are those lines of greater oratorical power⁶²¹ in In Catilinam [l.7.17–8.19] when the Orator brings in the fatherland as a speaker: ‘If [he says] your parents feared and hated you, and you could in no way please them, in my opinion you would make off somewhere out of their sight. Now your fatherland, which is the common parent of all of us, hates and fears you, and for long now has had no opinion of you but that you are contemplating parricide against her. [E4v] Will you neither respect her authority nor submit to her judgement nor be afraid of her might? And she, Catiline, thus pleads with you, and in some way silently addresses you: “There has been no crime done these many years now except by you; no ⁶¹⁹ ‘The blind’.

⁶²⁰ The Latin reads ‘So in Virgil’s Aeneid II’ (Virgilii Aeneid. 2), leaving the subject of the sentence unexplained; 1618 and 1629 both abbreviate to ‘Virg’. All editions misnumber the book.

⁶²¹ ‘maiorum laterum’, literally ‘of greater lungs’: cf. Quintilian, IX.2.29, referencing Cicero, Orator 25.85.

outrage except by you; by you alone the murders of many citizens, by you the harassing and pillaging of our allies has gone unpaid and scot-free; you have been able not only to ignore the laws and inquests but even to overturn them and break them apart. Those former acts of yours, though they should not have been borne, I nonetheless bore as I could; but now that the whole of me is in fear because of you alone, that whenever I hear a noise I fear Catiline, that it seems impossible that any counsel should be taken against me which isn't connected with your crimes, is not to be borne. So go, and take this fear from me: if it is true, so that I should not be oppressed; but if it is false, that at last I may cease fearing." If your fatherland, as I said, speaks to you so, oughtn't she to get what she asks for, even if she can't use force?' Here you see how fittingly the character is both introduced and put away.

But enough of the figure of prosopopoeia; by which, as if by some machinery in the theatre, any character not only of men but even gods is invented by the poets; on account of which the orator who is inspired by this poetic afflation is particularly to be admired.

Chapter 29

Such was the logismus of a sentence: now comes dialogismus, which is in questioning and answering. Questioning is fashioned from deliberation [deliberatio], and from anticipating an objection (occupatio). It is deliberation, when we from time to time ask as it were the different reasons of our inquiry: to which, after the minds of our hearers have been held in suspense for some time, [E5r] an unexpected answer is added.⁶²² Deliberation is either aporia or anacoenosis.

APORIA⁶²³ is a deliberation with ourselves. Pro Cluentio [1.4]: ‘For my part, as far as this concerns me, I don’t know where to turn. Shall I deny that there was that disgrace of corrupt judges? Shall I deny that that matter has been stirred up in meetings, brought before the judges, discussed in the Senate? Shall I pluck out from men’s minds such a belief, so deeply ingrained, so longstanding? [The answer:] It is not in my powers to do so: it is a matter for your aid (judges), to come to the aid of this man’s innocence in this calamitous accusation as if to some completely catastrophic fire or blaze that affected us all’;

Aeneid IV [534–8]:

Look, what am I to do? Shall I try for one of my former suitors again, and be laughed at? Shall I humbly seek marriage among the Numidians when I have so often already disdained them for husbands? So shall I follow the Trojan fleet and the Trojans’ commands to the end?

At last the answer of her uncertainty follows [547]:

Nay, die according to your deserts, and fend off sorrow with iron.

A famous example of aporia is in Metamorphoses VIII [481ff.] where the poet skilfully describes Althaea deliberating with herself over the death of her son Meleager.

⁶²² Cf. Quintilian, IX.2.21–2.

⁶²³ In the margin, ‘addubitatio’ (uncertainty).

Chapter 30

ANACOENOSIS⁶²⁴ is a deliberation with others: [Cicero,] Pro Quinctio [17.54]: ‘I ask this of you, Caius Aquillius, Lucius Lucilius, Publius Quinctilius, Marcus Marcellus: a certain associate and connection of mine, and with whom I have a longstanding relationship which a recent dispute over money has interrupted, has not come to meet me in court. Do I demand of the praetor that I should be allowed to seize his goods? Or, since he has a house, [E5v] a wife, children in Rome, should I rather give notice at his house? What is it, pray, that can seem the right thing to you in this matter? [The answer of the deliberation follows:] Of course: if I know your goodness and wisdom aright, I am not much mistaken what you would answer if you were asked: first wait, then if he seems to be keeping out of your way and playing along for too long, call together our friends, ask who is his agent, give notice at his house. It can hardly be told how many things you would reply there are to be done before it comes to this final and necessary⁶²⁵ measure’.

⁶²⁴ In the margin, ‘communicatio’ (deliberation with others).

⁶²⁵ ‘extremam ac necessariam’; modern editions read ‘extremam necessario’ (extreme by necessity).

Chapter 31

And such is the dialogismus of deliberation: now comes the dialogismus of anticipating an objection (occupatio), when we anticipate a question from the opposing counsel, and give an answer to it. And so this dialogismus is called, as to the first part PROLEPSIS,⁶²⁶ as to the second PROSAPODOSIS.⁶²⁷ Prolepsis is connected with prosopopoeia, and in the same way is sometimes indirect (obliqua), at other times direct. INDIRECT PROLEPSIS is that which contains an imperfect prosopopoeia. Pro Roscio Amerino [1.1]: ‘I think, judges, you are wondering why it is that when so many of the top orators and noblest men are seated, I of all people should stand up’, etc. In due course [1.2] the prosapodosis is brought in: ‘So what thing above all others impelled me to take on Sextus Roscius’ case?’ and so on. So in Pro Caelio [1.1]: ‘If anyone, judges, should chance to be now present who was ignorant of our laws, judicial system and customs ...’ The answer comes: ‘He would be truly amazed ...’

This [indirect] prolepsis is very well suited to the openings (prooemia) of speeches. DIRECT PROLEPSIS is that which contains a perfect prosopopoeia. [E6r] Pro Coelio [17.39]: ‘Someone will say, So is this your method of discipline? Is this how you instruct young men? Was it for this that his parent entrusted and handed over their son to you, that he would spend his youth in the pursuit of love and pleasures, and that you should defend this life and manner of study? [The prosapodosis follows:] I for my part – if anyone, judges, had that strength of mind and that disposition to virtue and self-control that he scorned all luxuries and spent the whole course of his life in bodily labour and mental strife, whom neither rest⁶²⁸ nor the pursuits of his equals, nor games nor banquets delighted, who thought nothing in life worth seeking but what was associated with praiseworthy and meritorious behaviour, him in my opinion I consider to have been gifted and decorated with such good qualities as to be divine’.

The dialogismus is especially protracted in Pro Quinctio [22.71–3]: ‘I want to make a case concerning a matter of money [says the orator [Cicero]]. It is not allowed. [This is the anticipation of the opposing counsel. The answer follows:] But that is the point at issue. [Anticipation:] That is not my problem; you must answer a capital charge. [Answer:] Make your accusation then, if such is to be⁶²⁹ necessary. [Ant.] No, he says, unless you plead your case first – in a way that’s not customary. [Ans.] You must make the case; the time ⁶²⁶ In the margin, ‘occupatio’ (anticipating a question).

⁶²⁷ In the margin, ‘subiectio’ (subjoining an answer).

⁶²⁸ Butler omits by mistake the words ‘non remissio’ (nor relaxation).

⁶²⁹ ‘erit’. Modern editions read ‘est’ (is).

to be fixed as we decide; let the judge himself be summoned.⁶³⁰ [Ant.] What then? Will you find some patron, a man of old-fashioned duty, such as to be indifferent to our importance and the esteem in which we are held? For me, Lucius Philippus will fight my corner, our city's finest man in terms of eloquence, dignity and honour; Hortensius will speak, a man outstanding in quality, nobility and public esteem; and the noblest and most powerful men will come forward, the sight of whom all gathered together would terrify not only Publius Quinctius who is fighting for his life but anyone who was in no danger at all. [The final answer contains an irony:] This is an unequal contest, [E6v] one⁶³¹ in which you have left this man no place where he may even stand', etc.

⁶³⁰ 'arcessetur'; modern editions read 'coercebitur' (suppressed, i.e. removed).

⁶³¹ Modern editions include some extra words here.

Chapter 32

These, therefore, are the figures of questioning in deliberation and anticipation of an objection. Answer is figured in epitrope and synchoreasis.

It is EPITROPE⁶³² when licence is permitted (licentia condonatur) for something done. De Lege Agraria II:⁶³³ ‘If there is anything that you have tracked, found out, brought out of the shadows; albeit it is unjust, nevertheless, be sure to use it to its utmost, because it is convenient⁶³⁴ and since you yourself brought it to bear’.

Sometimes irony is mixed with it; Aeneid IV [377–81]:

Now too the messenger of the gods, sent from Jupiter on high,⁶³⁵ brings the fearsome orders through the skies. Sure this is work for gods, this is a care to trouble their repose. I neither hold you back nor contradict your words: go then, make for Italy with the wind behind you, seek your kingdoms across the waves.

The irony in the following example is rather evident: [Cicero,] Pro Flacco [38.96]: ‘Let us then offer a sacrifice to Lentulus, let us make an offering to Cethegus, let us call back those we threw out; let us in turn suffer the penalties, if so it please the gods,⁶³⁶ of too great a sense of duty and the highest love we bear for our country’.

⁶³² In the margin, ‘permissio’.

⁶³³ I.1.3.

⁶³⁴ ‘com[mo]dum’.

⁶³⁵ ‘ab alto’; modern editions read ‘ab ipso’, ‘from Jupiter himself’.

⁶³⁶ ‘diis’. Not in modern editions, which imply ‘if so it please you’.

Chapter 33

It is SYNCHORESIS,⁶³⁷ when something said or an argument is granted (condonatur). In Verrem VII:⁶³⁸ ‘Let him be a temple-robber, let him be a thief, let him be the prince of all offences and vices; but he’s a good general’;

Aeneid X [67]:

Italiam petiit fatis auctoribus (esto)

He made for Italy at the instigation of the fates; so be it;

Aeneid VII [312–14]:

[E7r]

If I cannot persuade the gods above, I will move the Underworld. It’s not given to me to keep him from the realms of Latium – so be it – and Lavinia remains fixed by the fates for his wife.

This ornament is especially pleasing in a speech, when we grant something which is damaging to him to whom we grant it, as is often the case in arguments and controversies;⁶³⁹ Pro Ligario [l.2]: ‘You have, therefore, Tubero, what a prosecutor can hope for most, a guilty man who confesses; but nevertheless he confesses this, that he was in the same party as you, and of a man worthy of all praise – your father. And so it is necessary first that you confess your own criminality before you condemn any fault of Ligarius’.

⁶³⁷ In the margin, ‘concessio’.

⁶³⁸ II.5.4.

⁶³⁹ ‘This form of speech delights most, ... when that which we grant is prejudicial to, and stings the objector, as in controversies it often happens’ (Smith, Mysterie, N3v).

Epilogue of On Elocution

And so it is concerning the ornaments of rhetorical style: which necessarily make an ampler ornament of oratory the more they run together, as in that example from the defence of Ligarius [3.9]: ‘It is certain that he fought in arms against Caesar. For what was that sword of yours doing (agebat), Tubero, unsheathed in the fight at Pharsalia? Whose side was that blade aiming for (petebat)? What was the rationale behind your arms? What was going on in your mind, your eyes, your hands, the fire in your spirit? What did you want (cupiebas), what were you hoping for (optabas)?’ Here there are various metonymies: ‘sword’, ‘arms’, for the subject, a man; but the metaphors are particularly distinguished: ‘fire’ (ardor), and especially those that attribute thought and action to inanimate things, ‘sword’, ‘sword-point’; ‘doing’, ‘aiming’, ‘rationale’; then a synecdoche, ‘blade’ (mucro) for ‘sword’, ‘side’ for the whole man; then in the verbs there is epistrophe of the endings, ‘agebat, petebat, cupiebas, optabas’; finally in the whole passage (sententia) there is an apostrophe of forceful and urgent questioning. The orator [Cicero] is said to have made such use of every kind of figure and trope, [E7v] that Caesar, though he was both judge and opponent in the case, like a man bewitched and bewildered, changed colour more than once and let his papers slip from his hands. This, to be sure, was Plato’s γοητεία (goēteia, witchcraft),⁶⁴⁰ and this rhetoric turned the mind and became the master of the greatest of generals.

BOOK II⁶⁴¹

On Pronunciation

Chapter 1

Concerning the voice and delivery [prolatio]

The rules of rhetorical style (elocutio) (which is the first part of the art of rhetoric) have been set out in the tropes and figures: let us come now to delivery (pronunciation), the second part of rhetoric.

Delivery is the fitting utterance (enunciatio) of rhetorical style (elocutio), and surely much more important and effective than style itself.

To this [faculty] Demosthenes is said to have given first place, when he was asked what was the most important thing in speaking, and second place too, and third.⁶⁴² For that reason I am in the habit of⁶⁴³ thinking the better of that saying of Aeschines, who, when he had left Athens due to the ignominy of a judgement made against him, and taken himself to Rhodes, after being asked by the Rhodians [E8v], he is said to have read out that famous oration which he had spoken against Ctesiphon, with Demosthenes opposing; and the day after he read it, he was asked also to read that one which was given by Demosthenes on behalf of Ctesiphon: and when he had read it in his sweetest and most powerful voice to the admiration of all, he said, how much more you would have admired it, if you had heard him speak it himself. By which he showed sufficiently, how much [it's power] came down to the performance, that one might think the same oration a different one if the speaker were changed. And of this, Hortensius too is a great example; for long he was the chief among orators, and afterwards the equal of Cicero, but always second to him; and yet his writings were so far from his reputation for lively eloquence, that something seems to have delighted his listeners when he spoke, that afterwards his readers were unable to discover.

⁶⁴¹ Book II follows Talon word for word, with a little abridgment. A great part of it is excerpted from passages in Cicero, De Oratore III and Quintilian, XI.3, and to a lesser extent Cicero's Orator ad M. Brutum. In the 1629 edition Butler enlarges the text slightly and adds what appear to be his own notes to each chapter.

⁶⁴² Cicero, De Oratore III.56.213; this passage is quoted verbatim.

⁶⁴³ [s]olet.

Therefore, in this part of rhetoric especially all those insults of Plato are most rightly applied: and every trick ὀψοποιΐας, κομμώσιος, κολακείας, γοητείας, ψύχαγωγίας (opsopoiias, kommōsios, kolakeias, goēteias, psukhagōgias)⁶⁴⁴ will be found in this one faculty alone.

There are two parts of delivery: voice (vox), from which comes utterance (prolatio)⁶⁴⁵ (which is what delivery is commonly called), and gesture (gestus), from which comes action (actio).⁶⁴⁶

And of these two parts, the one concerns the ears, the other the eyes: by which two senses almost all cognition comes to the mind. But concerning the voice first, whose good quality is indeed the first thing we must hope for; then, whatever quality it is, it must be looked after and exercised; in such a way that everything which is to be delivered, is delivered through the sound of the voice appropriate to the things that are spoken.

And of the voice there is one general precept, that it should not be too high, nor too low. For all purpose is weakened by a soft murmuring; and on the other hand, to speak everything in a shout is madness.

And so [the voice] should remain in the middle register between the lowest and the highest; and within that register there ought to be frequent modulation of the voice.

[E9r]

For it is pleasing if at times it rises in fiercer contention, and at times drops as it were by steps of sound. This variety, and this passing through all the sounds of the voice, will both preserve the voice itself, and add delight to the speaker's gestures. This is that evenness of tone, whose opposite, μονοτονία (monotonia),⁶⁴⁷ Quintilian along with Cicero judges greatly to be avoided.

Now it is useful and agreeable to begin a speech in a quieter voice, and to grow from this by steps; since to be speaking in a raised voice (clamare) from the beginning is somewhat boorish. However, the governor of this vocal variety should be the judgement of the mind. For ⁶⁴⁴ Of cooking, embellishment, flattery, witchcraft and leading or charming the mind.

⁶⁴⁵ Prolatio is Butler's word choice; the term applies to the speaking voice and music. See also 'prolation' in English: 'The action of uttering a word or sound; utterance, articulation'; 'a measure, a strain of melody, a tune' (OED 2a and 2b, the latter now obsolete).

⁶⁴⁶ Cf. Quintilian, XI.3.1: 'Delivery is called by many, "action"'.

⁶⁴⁷ Monotony; Quintilian, XI.3.45.

this is the ultimate purpose of delivery, that the voice should be the performer and of the mind. For voices are like the strings of an instrument,⁶⁴⁸ and sound as they are struck by the movements of the mind.

⁶⁴⁸ Cicero, De Oratore III.57.216.

Chapter 2

On the voice applied to individual words

Therefore, the thought behind the voice (ratio vocis) will be applied to individual words, or to a whole sentence. And concerning the delivery of individual words, Quintilian teaches us thus:⁶⁴⁹ Let us take for an example that opening of Cicero's, in his classic speech Pro Milone: though the face is the same, does not the expression (vultus), as it were, have to change at almost every comma? 'Even if I am afraid, judges, that it is shameful that, beginning to speak on behalf of a very brave man, I should feel fear';⁶⁵⁰ even though in its whole intent it is restrained and subdued, because it is both an opening, [E9v] and an opening full of anxiety, nevertheless it will be of necessity somewhat fuller and more resolute when he says 'on behalf of a very brave man' than when he says 'Even if I am afraid', 'it is shameful' and 'I should feel fear'. Now the second breath should grow, and with a natural effort, by which we speak our next words with less fearfulness, and through which Milo's greatness of soul is indicated: 'and it is not at all fitting, when Titus Annius [Milo] himself is more concerned about the safety of the republic than his own'. Next there is something of a rebuke to himself: 'that I should be unable to bring to his defence a similar greatness of soul'; then these more unpleasant matters: 'nevertheless this new appearance of a new kind of trial frightens my eyes'. And now this, with almost, as they say, every pipe open (apertis tibiis): 'which look in every direction to try and find the former customs of the law courts and the ancient manner of a trial'; and what follows is still broader and less restrained: 'for this assembly of yours is not surrounded by a public gallery as used to be the case'. And I have paid attention to this so that it is clear that there is some variety of delivery not merely between the 'limbs' ['the longer units of speech', i.e. the sentences] of a case, but between its very 'joints' ['the smaller ones', i.e. the words]; and without this no word would have either greater or lesser importance.⁶⁵¹ So says Quintilian concerning the pronunciation of individual words; and in this of necessity the kinds of tropes, if there are being used, should shed their light. For in no other wise are either irony or metaphor more clearly or more vigorously comprehended. It is the same with the pronunciation of figures of a word:

⁶⁴⁹ Quintilian, XI.3.47–51, quoted verbatim.

⁶⁵⁰ Cicero, Pro Milone, I.1.

⁶⁵¹ Quintilian, XI.3.51.

Litigat et podagra Diodorus, Flacce, laborat.

Sed nil patrono porrigit: haec chiragra est.⁶⁵²

(Diodorus goes to law when, Flaccus, he labours with gout in his feet.

But he offers nothing to his patron: that is gout in the hands!)

For here of course there is a figure inherent in the words ‘podagra’ [gout in his feet] and ‘chiragra’ [gout in his hands] and they should be delivered with a certain special emphasis beyond the others. The same reasoning applies to all the other figures of a word.

[E10r]

Ipsa sonant arbusta, Deus, Deus ille, Menalca

(The very orchards sound out, ‘A god, a god he is, Menalcas!’);⁶⁵³

Te, dulcis coniux, te solo in littore secum,

Te veniente die, te decedente canebat.

(You, his sweet wife, it was you he sang by himself alone on the shore, you at the coming day, you as it departed);⁶⁵⁴

Certus locus, certa lex, certum Tribunal

(There is a fixed place, a fixed law, and a fixed lawcourt),⁶⁵⁵ where ‘Deus’ [God] has the same accent [prosodia] when spoken twice, as does ‘te’ [you] spoken four times, and ‘certus ... certa ... certum’ [fixed].

⁶⁵² Martial, Epigrams, I.98 (99 to Butler).

⁶⁵³ Virgil, Eclogues V.64.

⁶⁵⁴ Virgil, Georgics IV.465–6.

⁶⁵⁵ Cicero, In Verrem II.5.79.

Chapter 3

On the voice applied to a whole sentence

Now follows the delivery of a whole sentence,⁶⁵⁶ in which are included figures of a sentence and every form of emotion (affectus).

And this is that singing, which Tullius [Cicero] and Fabius [Quintilian] say Demosthenes and Aeschines meant when they criticised each other for the inflection and play of their voice, which we should not disapprove of on that account: for when one upbraids the other, it is clear that the other had done it.⁶⁵⁷

And there is an accent (prosodia) of raising or lowering [or pitching] the voice in a speech as a whole just as there is for individual words.

An example of the voice pitched high is Pro Ligario [III.6–7]:⁶⁵⁸ ‘See, how I am not afraid, Caesar, how great is the light of your generosity and wisdom shed upon me as I speak before you. When war began, Caesar, and even when it had run the great part of its course, I went out, under no threat of force but of my own judgement and volition, to join that army that had been raised against you’, and this the orator spoke with a great exertion of the voice. There is a different voice⁶⁵⁹ in this high register, and one almost beyond the normal range of the instrument [i.e. the voice], to which the Greeks have given the name ‘bitterness’ (amaritudo), that is immoderately fierce and almost beyond the natural scope [E10v] of the human voice, as when the populace was throwing Cicero’s action in defence of Rabirius into confusion with its heckling against him:⁶⁶⁰ ‘This clamour (he says) doesn’t disturb me at all, rather it comforts me; since it shows that some citizens are misinformed, but not many. Never (believe me) would that silent part of the Roman people have made me consul if it had thought I would be worried by your shouting. How much less are you heckling already?’⁶⁶¹ Why do you not hold your tongues that prove how stupid, and how few you are?’ The first words here are less passionate: but the final ones have this ‘bitterness’ of voice.

⁶⁵⁶ As before, ‘sententia’ may mean clause or period as well as sentence.

⁶⁵⁷ Quintilian, XI.3.168, quoted verbatim.

⁶⁵⁸ Cf. ibid., XI.3.166.

⁶⁵⁹ Ibid., XI.3.169, quoted verbatim but with additions.

⁶⁶⁰ Cicero, Pro Rabirio Perduellionis Reo, 6.18.

⁶⁶¹ Part of the quotation from Cicero, although printed by Butler as if it is not.

An example of a low (gravis) but full voice is Philippics II [25.63]: ‘If it had happened at supper, among your monstrous drinking-vessels, who would not think it disgraceful? But in an assembly of the Roman people, conducting public business, this master of the horse, for whom it should be a matter of shame to belch in public, throwing up, filled his own lap and the whole judgement-seat with bits of food, stinking of wine’. In the delivery of this charge, everything should be lengthened, the vowels prolonged, the throat opened wide, in order to express an even greater disgust than before.

An example of a moderate voice⁶⁶² is Pro Ligario [3.9]: ‘For what was that sword of yours doing, Tubero, unsheathed in the fight at Pharsalia? Whose side was that blade aiming for? What was the meaning behind your weapons? What was going on in your mind, your eyes, your hands, your fiery spirit? What did you want, what were you hoping for?’

⁶⁶² Cf. Quintilian, XI.3.166.

Chapter 4

On the voice applied to individual emotions [affectus]

And these things are common to almost every emotion: but there are particular ones for o, whose strike and touch⁶⁶³ will be expressed by the voice.

In pitiful speech the voice will be flexible, full, broken, tearful,⁶⁶⁴ as in that place in the speech of [Gaius] Gracchus:⁶⁶⁵ ‘Where shall I take myself, wretch that I am? Where to turn? To the Capitol? But it is awash with my brother’s blood. Home? To see my mother, wretched, wailing and cast down?’ Tullius [Cicero] says⁶⁶⁶ that these things were delivered by Gracchus with eyes, voice and gesture, so that even his enemies could not hold back their tears.

In a speech of anger,⁶⁶⁷ the voice is hostile, high, excitable, and frequently breaking off. Philippics II [34.86]: ‘O how famous your eloquence was, when you harangued the people in the nude! Is anything more disgraceful? More shameful? More worthy of every punishment? You’re not waiting for me to sting you with more torments still, are you? If you have an ounce of feeling, this speech of mine must be tearing you, bloodying you. I’m afraid I may lessen the authority and glory of the greatest men: I will speak nonetheless, impelled by sorrow. What is more unworthy, than that that man lives, who placed the diadem [on Caesar’s head], when everyone admits that he who rejected it was rightfully killed?’

This aposiopesis (reticentia) calls for such a voice:

⁶⁶³ Cf. Cicero, De Oratore III.57.216 quoted above, chapter 1 (fin.).

⁶⁶⁴ Cf. ibid., III.58.217.

⁶⁶⁵ Quoted ibid., III.56.214. In the margin, ‘De Oratore III’.

⁶⁶⁶ Ibid.

⁶⁶⁷ Ibid., III.58.217.

Do you now, winds, mix up heaven and earth with no command from me, etc.⁶⁶⁸

[E11v]

In fear and shame, the sound is restrained and hesitant: Terence, The Eunuch [83–4]:

I am shaking and shivering all over, Parmeno, since I saw her.

Such a voice was Cicero's in many of his openings (exordia) as is indicated by the Pro Deiotaro [1]: 'As, Gaius Caesar, in all cases of greater importance, it's my habit to be more powerfully moved at the beginning of speaking than either custom or my age seems to call for; so in this case there are many things disturb me, so much so that, just as much as my loyalty and zeal impel me to defend the safety of king Deiotarus, so does fear detract from my abilities'.

When describing pleasure, a gentle, mild, effusive, cheerful⁶⁶⁹ kind of voice is desirable. Such is Aeneas' voice in Aeneid I [459–63] as he gazes on the fall of Troy depicted in tapestries.⁶⁷⁰

He stood still, and tears in his eyes, said: Achates, what place, what realm on earth is not now full of our struggle? Look, here's Priam; here too the due rewards for glory, here is the sadness of things, and reminders of death touch the heart. Put aside your fear: this renown will bring you safety.

Grief without lamentation, requires something grave, and overlaid with a deep (imo) sound and pressure;⁶⁷¹ In Pisonem [6,13]:

Do you recall, you piece of filth, when I had come to you with Gaius Piso at about the fifth hour, that you came out of some hovel or other, head wrapped, with your slippers on? And when you'd breathed all over us the most revolting cookshop odours from ⁶⁶⁸ Virgil, Aeneid I.133. The actual aposiopesis (called here reticentia), as quoted above in Book I, chapter 26, continues: 'and dare to raise up such confusion? You whom I – but better to settle the billowing sea ...'

⁶⁶⁹ Cicero, De Oratore III.58.219.

⁶⁷⁰ Talon, a sixteenth-century northern Frenchman, sees the depictions in terms of tapestries, rather than (as they are usually taken) mural paintings. Virgil's text is unspecific, though Talon will have noted the 'pictis tapetis' at VII.277.

⁶⁷¹ Cicero, De Oratore III.58.219; modern editions read 'uno' for Butler's 'imo', 'with a uniform sound and pressure', and punctuate to give 'Grief requires something grave but without lamentation'.

that fetid mouth of yours, you excused yourself on grounds of an illness, because you said that you were taking a cure involving some wine-based medicines. And [E12r] when we'd accepted this pretence (what else could we do?) we stood a little while in the stink and smoke from that dive of a cookshop of yours, from which you drove us out as much by the filthiness of your answers as the disgustingness of your belches.

For flattery, apologising, [and] asking for something, the voice is light and gentle;⁶⁷² Aeneid IV [314–19]:

Do you run from me? By these tears and your right hand, I beg you (when I have left myself nothing else now, wretch that I am), by our marriage and the wedding rites we have begun, if I have deserved anything good of you, or anything of mine was sweet to you, have pity on this falling house and (if there is any room still for these entreaties) put off your resolve.

And these things, concerning the voice, applied to both individual words and whole emotions, should be done in moderation: for the exercise of which, Fabius [Quintilian] judges that it is best to learn by heart the greatest variety possible containing every inflexion of the voice,⁶⁷³ and to speak them every day, as we do: so that we are ready for everything at once. Likewise, Cicero corrected the opposite bad habit through this moderation. For he used to speak everything without let-up, without variety, at the top of his voice and with the exertion of his whole body.⁶⁷⁴ But after travelling in Greece and Asia Minor and having listened to orators of all kinds, who employed this remedy of restraint, at last he returned not only better trained but almost a changed man.⁶⁷⁵

On gesture and action

Thus far concerning the voice: there remains the law too of gesture (which Quintilian⁶⁷⁶ calls ‘chironomy’⁶⁷⁷), of much greater power than any voice can be.

[E12v]

For in all those things⁶⁷⁸ which pertain to action, there is a certain power given by nature: which is why the unskilled, the common crowd and indeed the barbarians are greatly moved by it. Words move no one except for one who is connected by the association of a common language, and sentences often fly swiftly past the attention of men who are not swift themselves. But action, which by itself projects the emotions of the heart, moves everyone; for the hearts of all are stirred by the same emotions, and they recognise them in others, and judge of⁶⁷⁹ them in themselves, by the same signs. A great proof of this is the pantomime, which makes its meaning clear to all by gesture alone, without voice: so that gesture seems to be as it were a common language (sermo) of men across all those peoples with such diversity of tongues. Indeed, even of animals, who display their emotions through signs: and moreover even inanimate things, since pictures and statues communicate thus silently. And so gesture is rightly called by Cicero the language and eloquence of the body,⁶⁸⁰ and the two supreme orators, Demosthenes and Cicero, placed the highest emphasis on it. Demosthenes would compose his gestures and actions of the body by watching himself in a large mirror,⁶⁸¹ and although that reflection gave him a back-to-front picture, he trusted his eyes exactly in the effect he was achieving. Moreover, he employed a satiric actor as his master in these arts. And Cicero too used actors as masters in his study of this, Roscius the comedian, and Aesopus the tragedian. And Quintilian is our authority⁶⁸² that chironomy goes back as far as heroic times, and was approved by Socrates himself, and placed by Plato too among the civil virtues.

There is one supreme law here, that gesture should conform to all the inflexions of the voice.

Chapter 6

On gesture of the whole body

The orator [Cicero] says that one should be governor of one's own body through its trunk, and by a manly suppleness of the sides,⁶⁸³ not through stagey gesticulation; and should fit one's action [F1r] to the senses rather than to the words. And the stance of the body should be naturally erect and tall. For indeed nature gave man a lofty⁶⁸⁴ face, and ordered him to gaze on the heavens and raise his countenance on high to the stars.⁶⁸⁵

The proof of how inelegant the opposite – changing position and swaying about – is, is that motion of Curio's, which Julius also recorded for posterity (as appears in Brutus),⁶⁸⁶ 'when he was swaying his whole body from side to side, he asked, who it was that was speaking out of a boat. And Cnaeus Sicinius, a vulgar but quite funny man [...]:⁶⁸⁷ when as tribune of the people he had led out Curio and Octavius as consuls, and Curio had spoken at length while his colleague Octavius remained seated, being wrapped up in bandages and smeared with lots of medicaments on account of the gout, said, You can never thank your colleague enough, Octavius; if he hadn't thrown himself about in that way of his, today the flies would have eaten you out there'.

⁶⁸³ Cicero, Orator 18.59.

⁶⁸⁴ The Latin has 'sublime', and the meaning is lofty in the sense of high up (unlike, say, a dog's face, which is low down).

⁶⁸⁵ Ovid, Metamorphoses I.85–6.

⁶⁸⁶ Cicero, Brutus, 60.216–17; in the margin, Quintilian, Institutio oratoria XI.3 [129].

⁶⁸⁷ Butler condenses Cicero, leaving out the crucial sub-clause: 'made a jest to the same effect'.

Chapter 7

On gesture of the head, forehead and eyes

So much for gestures of the whole body. Each of the parts of the body has its own method (ratio), and of particular importance is that of the head, which harmonises with the stance of the body. Humility and modesty is signified by a bowed head: and by this gesture the poet [Virgil] expresses the queen's anxiety: Aeneid I [561]:

Then Dido spoke briefly, her eyes lowered.

Homer⁶⁸⁸ offers the same gesture of modesty with the example of Ulysses, who he says would stand with eyes [F1V] cast down to the ground and with staff unmoving before he poured forth his storm of eloquence; and it is fitting that Cicero's fear in the openings of his speeches is denoted by this gesture; and indeed he attests to this in that speech 'As, Gaius Caesar, in all cases of greater importance' etc. [Pro Deiotaro 1.1]. The gaze is turned in the same direction as the gesture of the body, with the exceptions, where something is to be condemned or rejected, where we seem to be turned away.⁶⁸⁹ Aeneid III [620]:

... Gods, avert such a plague from the earth;

Aeneid I [335]:

... I'm hardly myself worthy of such honour.⁶⁹⁰

But⁶⁹¹ to make a gesture with head alone, or to make one frequently, was seen as a fault by teachers of drama. To strike one's forehead in grief seemed the gesture of an orator to Cicero, but to Fabius [Quintilian] that of an actor. But⁶⁹² in the face and countenance are all ⁶⁸⁸ In the margin, Iliad III [216–17].

⁶⁸⁹ Quintilian, XI.3.70, slightly paraphrased.

⁶⁹⁰ In the first example, the speaker (Achaemenides) is imagined turning his face to the heavens; in the second, Venus, pretending to be a mortal, is displaying false modesty, and presumably not looking Aeneas in the eye.

⁶⁹¹ Quintilian, XI.3.71.

things: and in that, all mastery belongs to the eyes. For the countenance is the image of the heart and mind, and it is the eyes that show it.⁶⁹³ Therefore just as you should make sure that nothing is unsuitable or affected, so there should be great moderation in the expression of the eyes, which have as many forms of meaning and communication as there are emotions of the heart and mind.⁶⁹⁴ Faults of the nostrils, lips, chin,⁶⁹⁵ neck and shoulders are marked to a higher degree.⁶⁹⁶

Demosthenes would toss his shoulders about: but this fault he is said to have corrected, in this way: that when he spoke standing on a certain narrow platform, a spear would hang down directly over his shoulder, so that if in the heat of speaking he failed to avoid this fault, he would be warned of it by its striking him.⁶⁹⁷

⁶⁹³ Ibid., = Orator 18.60, from which the following sentence is also taken.

⁶⁹⁵ The 1618 edition correctly reads 'menti' for 1621's 'mentis'.

⁶⁹⁶ Cf. Quintilian, XI.3.80–83, which lists the faults.

⁶⁹⁷ Ibid., XI.3.130.

Chapter 8

On gesture of the arm, hand and fingers

But the arm is extended rather forwards, like a kind of weapon of oratory:⁶⁹⁸ this is greatly becoming in uninterrupted and flowing passages; and [F2r] when something more beautiful or richer is to be said (such as that passage ‘rocks and desert places reply to the voice’), it is extended wide, and the speech itself spreads out with that military gesture.⁶⁹⁹ And the left arm, if anything is to be done with it, should be raised only so far as to make as it were its normal angle.⁷⁰⁰ But the hand, though not too lively, and following the words with the fingers, not expressing them,⁷⁰¹ has so much power that the action would seem missing without it.⁷⁰² For the other parts of the body assist the speaker; but the hand almost speaks itself.⁷⁰³ Hence those lines of Persius, Satires IV [6–8]:

So when the mob, their indignation roused, is raging, your spirit brings you the power to make silences of the fiery rabble by the dignity of your hand-gesture.

But the left hand never makes a gesture by itself; but often matches itself to the right hand.⁷⁰⁴ Thus that aporia of Gracchus’,⁷⁰⁵ ‘Where shall I take myself, wretch that I am?’ should be acted with hands joined. How great a gesture indeed the joining of hands is, an example from the poet [Virgil] shows; Aeneid I [93–6]:

⁶⁹⁸ Cicero, De Oratore III.59.220.

⁶⁹⁹ In the margin, Quintilian, XI.3 [84, referencing Cicero, Pro Archia 8.19]; ‘that military’ is an addition of Talon’s.

⁷⁰⁰ Quintilian, XI.3.141.

⁷⁰¹ Cicero, De Oratore III.59.220.

⁷⁰² Cf. Quintilian, XI.3.85.

⁷⁰³ Ibid.

⁷⁰⁴ Ibid., XI.3.114.

⁷⁰⁵ See above, chapter 4.

He groaned and holding out both palms to the stars cried out these words: O thrice and four times blessed those whose fate it was, in sight of their parents before the high walls of Troy, to die! ...

Here the poet shows the gesture first.⁷⁰⁶ But to clap the hands is a theatrical gesture.⁷⁰⁷ And so much for the whole hand: but in its fingers there is a certain particular gesture to each; and above all that most common one, by which the middle finger is joined to the thumb, with three fingers extended,⁷⁰⁸ and this is a rather insistent gesture; and the one with three fingers pressed to the thumb,⁷⁰⁹ and the index (which Antonius indicates that Crassus made skilful use of to express pain of heart and vehemence⁷¹⁰) is extended. [F2v] This is used in reproaching and pointing out (indicando, hence the name of that finger); with the hand after being held at the shoulder by turns slightly lowered, in affirmation; turned towards the ground, it is insistent; sometimes it is used for the number one.⁷¹¹ Also, very appropriate for modest speech is this gesture, in which the first four fingers come together gently into a point and the hand is brought towards us, either to the face or the chest, and then, facing downwards and stretched out a little, is relaxed.⁷¹² Quintilian believes that it was in this manner that Demosthenes began that speech on behalf of Ctesiphon with its timid and subdued beginning; and that Cicero's hand was similarly formed when he said 'If I have any ability – and, judges, I have a sense of how slight it is', etc.⁷¹³ So remarkable indeed is gesture of the fingers.

⁷⁰⁶ Virgil's word 'duplices' [l.93], which I have translated as it is usually taken, 'both', could perhaps be taken to mean 'one over the other' (cf. Aeneid IX.707), which may be how our author understands it.

⁷⁰⁹ Ibid., XI.3.94.

⁷¹⁰ Cf. Cicero, De Oratore II.45.188.

⁷¹² Ibid., XI.3.96.

⁷¹³ Ibid., XI.3.97, quoting Pro Archia 1.1.

Chapter 9

On gesture of the chest, thigh and foot

For the other parts of the body the faults have chiefly been noted: as, to thrust out the chest and stomach;⁷¹⁴ to beat the chest is a theatrical gesture for Fabius [Quintilian].⁷¹⁵ But to strike the thigh (which Cleon is believed to have been first to do at Athens) is frequently done, and is both becoming to the indignant, and exciting to the listener.⁷¹⁶ And as regards the feet, the stance and the taking of steps is to be observed.⁷¹⁷ And to change sides frequently from right to left, putting one's weight on one foot at a time, is absurd.⁷¹⁸ However the stamping of the foot at the beginnings and ends of a vigorous argument, is appropriate.⁷¹⁹ To take steps is permissible to the orator, but infrequently,⁷²⁰ and only in public cases where the stage is large and spacious, and when there are many judges, and hence in the senate, and in an assembly where many are distant. [F3r] But it is most unsuitable to run about: and Flavius Virginius wittily asked of the sophist opposing him, how many miles he had declaimed.⁷²¹

And⁷²² so much for gesture of the body, which was truly a marvellous instrument of eloquence to the great orators. But indeed against those orators who were scornfully dismissive of this same practice, an argument was taken up. For when Tullius [Cicero] was speaking against [Marcus] Calidius, he put, as an argument of refutation against the charge, that he had conducted the case of poisoning attempted on him so lamely, so calmly, so listlessly, and without gesture of the body. 'Would you, Marcus Calidius,' he said, 'behave so, unless you were making it up? Above all, when you're in the habit of fending off other men's dangers so passionately with that eloquence of yours, would you take so little trouble about your own? Where is the pain? Where is the fire in your soul, that usually has the skill to extract speech and grievances even from those who cannot speak? There's no emotion, no disorder of the body; no striking the forehead, nor the thigh; not even – the least we could expect – a stamp of the foot. As a result so far were you from setting our hearts aflame, we could hardly hold off falling asleep’.⁷²³ Thus did Tullius [Cicero] taunt Calidius in the very lawcourts, as if he were a fellow student of his in some college of rhetoric, insufficiently industrious and thoughtful in the discipline that he was professing.
